For many months our friend bravely and patiently lingered in the cruel agonies of his last sickness, and during that period of uncertainty many of us anxiously hoped that the dreaded message which we feared must come might in some way be averted. When the final message came that our friend and companion had passed to the great beyond, we rebelled against the cruel decree, and all our philosophies failed to keep down the bitter plaint that we sent forth from unwilling hearts.

Why should he go in the very ripeness of his mature manhood; so fond of life, so useful to his people, so thoughtful of the needs of others? The power that issued the final edict not only pierced the hearts of his devoted family, but of friends whose names are legion.

Some men are made of only one material. We see a man made of the finest clay, but of the softer mold; another stands against the storms of time as granite rock; another rises above the plains of mediocrity as a mountain peak, until the sunlight of the world's fame flashes about his head.

Here we find a man who lives out his existence amid the soft breezes and delicious perfumes that seem to be wafted by unknown powers from a sleeping Orient; another draws life's material from the sorrows of humanity through the uplifting of great strife and pain. One is made of stern material; another of the sweeter virtues that carry only peace along the lines of least resistance.

When time shall write the true history of our departed friend, we will find portrayed a man of composite character; the courage and strength of the soldier; mind and logic of the lawyer; the eloquence of the statesman; and, above all, the warm, true heart that bound his friendships to him.

When the war clouds enveloped our country and men of the stronger mold were found at the front, our friend offered his sword in his country's cause and served in foreign lands to the honor of his country and the credit of his State. When the dove of peace had once more closed the gates of war, he returned to his native State and received from a loving constituency a commission to serve them in the council of the Nation, which place he filled with earnest endeavor and strong devotion to the people he represented.

He had unyielding courage against the oppressor; he had a strong heart in the face of danger; he was ever quick to respond to duty's call, and his soul always beat in sympathy with the suffering and the destitute.

We have lost in his death one of the truest and best among us. A comrade has gone from us and left a place that can not be filled in the hearts of those who knew and honored him.

There is no death! What seems so is transition;
This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life elysian,
Whose portal we call Death.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, ARIOSTO A. WILEY was born at Clayton, in the celebrated county of Barbour, Ala., in 1848, and was descended from distinguished Scottish ancestry, who settled in Mecklenburg County, N. C., and were in full sympathy with the earliest American idea and spirit of independence as expressed in the famous Mecklenburg declaration. His father, James McCaleb Wiley, was an honored and eminent citizen, an able lawyer, and a learned judge, and grand master of the Masonic fraternity in the State of Alabama, who lived a long life of usefulness, in which he enjoyed the full confidence and approval of his people. His mother was a granddaughter of the Rev. John Brown, the first president of the college at Athens, Ga., and a noted and accomplished preacher and scholar.

The boyhood of young WILEY was spent in the city of Troy, and his school days were passed in the common schools of that period, the greater part of which was during the civil war. More fortunate than many in those days, he had the advantage of college training and was graduated from Emory and Henry, Virginia, in 1870. In 1871 he read law according to the custom of the day in a private law office in Clayton, his native town, and was admitted to practice within the same year. On the day following his admission to the bar he undertook the defense of a man on the charge of murder, and acquitted himself so signally as to spring at once into notice and reputation. In the same year he removed to Montgomery and became associated with one of the leading law firms in the State, which later became known as Rice & Wiley, and so continued till the death of the senior member, Hon. Samuel F. Rice, one of the most eminent jurists and attorneys of the South.

As a lawyer, Colonel WILEY took position early in the first rank of the profession. He was an indefatigable worker, a thorough student, vigorous, bold, able, and aggressive in the court room, and a formidable advocate in the management of his cases. He was equally strong in the practice in the Supreme Court, and commanded always the attention of court and bar.

He was a winning, eloquent, and persuasive speaker, and one of the charms of his nature and habit was that he paid the same attention and gave as much time to the preparation and study of his clients' cause without regard to the amount involved or the relative importance of parties. In other words, he was thorough and conscientious at all times. He was earnestly and enthusiastically the friend as well as the attorney of his clients. Their cause was to him always right. This ready sympathy and clannish devotion won for him among his clients the warmest feelings of friendship, and the generous and chivalrous nature of the man enabled him to hold his friends with "hooks of steel." It also served to make for him enemies, and be had them, as all strong men have had in the past and will continue to have in the future. What enemies he had were gained by aggressive services to clients and devoted loyalty and support to friends.

His range of practice was wide and varied, extending from the court room of the justice of peace to the Supreme Court of the United States.

As an evidence of the stability with which he held his clients he was elected attorney for the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad at its organization, and held the post for many years, and died in harness with them, beloved, honored, respected, and approved.

His boyhood developed during the civil war, and doubtless this had its influence upon the character as well as upon the life and life work of the man. At any rate, he seemed to take naturally to the military, and was early connected with the State volunteer militia, and held many responsible offices in this service, from captain of cavalry to colonel and staff officer with several governors of his State.

So he was prepared for military service in the Spanish-American war, and promptly responded to the call to arms. He was lieutenant-colonel of the Fifth Immune Regiment, and reached Cuba soon after the capture and occupation of Santiago.

In public as in professional life, Colonel WILEY was a conspicuous and successful man. He was eminently public-spirited and eminently well qualified for civic duties. He served as councilman in his home city for years, and was for many years elected first to the house and then to the senate of the State of Alabama. In his service as councilman and legislator no man did more arduous or successful work, and he was a recognized leader in every body to which he was called to membership, serving as chairman of the judiciary committee of the senate when he was elected to Congress.

So he was exceptionally qualified for the service which fell to his lot in Cuba. The Province of Santiago was in political and legal chaos. The general in command detailed Colonel WILEY, and he prepared a code of laws which was most effective in bringing about a speedy and peaceful settlement of all disorders, so much so that the governor of the Province gave him high credit and recommended his efforts as worthy of promotion.

Colonel WILEY was a broad-minded American, full of patriotism for the old flag, for the Union, and the United States. In his brave heart there lived as loyal and devoted patriotism and love for the flag as ever beat in all our history under "a coat of blue."

After the Spanish-American war Colonel WILEY was elected to Congress in 1900, and remained in office till his death. He was renominated for the Sixty-first Congress without a personal canvass and while he was lying upon the couch of his last illness. It was a splendid tribute of a splendid people to a splendid man and citizen. It was the voice of a great State to a beloved and honored son, saying unmistakably—

Well done, thou good and faithful servant.

Colonel WILEY was recognized as an orator of ability outside of his profession. He made numerous addresses upon a wide range of subjects and in different States. Among these special honors paid him was the invitation to represent his country in the Queen's Jubilee at Tampa, Fla., where he acquitted himself in such a way as to receive thanks in a personal letter from the Queen.

I knew Colonel WILEY for many years and knew him well. He was my friend always, and I loved him for his loyalty and his royal generosity. No man I ever met went further in the call of friendship or could be more implicitly relied upon to do a friend's part than ARIOSTO WILEY. He had ideals of friendship of his own, lofty as the towering pines of his loved State. Friendship was to him a principle and lifted him above the clouds and into the bright sunshine, where he lived up to the highest conception of that rare virtue. He was a friend "to tie to and to count on" with absolute faith and confidence. It was my lot to see him often in his last illness. I never saw a braver, truer man in pain and sickness. Racked with torture, which at times overcame the power of human nature to endure in silence, when the paroxysm passed his bedside was as his home was always, a rare delight and pleasant place for friends to meet and be happy. He was bright, cheerful, full of anecdotes, affectionate, and appreciative to the last, and uncomplaining. His people at home buried him with all the honors of a distinguished citizen and with what makes honors greater and more sacred—with tears from a thousand eyes and sighs from a thousand hearts, the perfect testimony of love and friendship.

There have been few men in Alabama who won and kept and deserved the honor and affection given by the people, especially the people of Montgomery, to ARIOSTO A. WILEY, lawyer, legislator, patriot, soldier, statesman, and friend.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, it was a very great shock to those of us who, in so short a time, had grown to know and love ARIOSTO A. WILEY when we learned of his death. I saw him a few days before he left Washington to die. His manly form and splendid presence were prostrate under searching pain, but the same heart, the same courage, and the same friendship that belonged to him here will go with him to eternity. There was a singular poetry in his nature. It came forth in all that he said and all that he did. His earnestness and belief in the higher things were such as are seldom to be found, and with them were knightly chivalry and courage, belief in man, belief in woman, and the disposition to do his duty without fear of consequences and without reck of what other people might think.

I feel always as though in these descriptions of friends on such occasions we tell very little. We can no more describe the personality of a man's mind and character than we can describe his bodily person so that it will be recognized.

His real memory, for those who knew and wish to know our friend, lies in his many works and in his many speeches. They tell of him. I looked over a few of those speeches within the last few days and found them brim full of himself. In one he was urging the passage of a law to allow the fighting masts of the Oquendo, which was sunk at Santiago, and of the Don Juan d'Austria, which was sunk at Manila, to be placed in the capitol grounds in Montgomery, a city which was, as he recalled, not only the capital of the State of Alabama, but also the first capital of the Southern Confederacy. He said:

They are to be used as flagstaffs from which to display the starry banner of the Union—the standard of a united country—as an emblem of the blended patriotism of the men and the sons of the men who wore both the blue and the gray in the fratricidal conflict in the long ago between the two great sections of our great and glorious Republic.

It will furnish another evidence of the truth that all sectional lines have been obliterated, and that we are banded together once more and forever in the common bonds of union, loyalty, fraternal love, and civil liberty.

Patriotism like this filled his nature, a patriotism that went out not only to his country, but to its people—to all his many friends that he made in every walk of life. I have felt that a eulogy which he delivered upon his friend, Robert E. Burke, could well be applied to himself:

Full of humanity himself, a reciprocating people delighted to honor him. Elected to Congress, he served his constituency faithfully and well. His life filled the measure of lofty aspiration, of a high and honorable ambition. His influence will work on silently for good, long after we have passed away. The virtues of such men are the common inheritance of us all.

We believe, Mr. Speaker, that light everlasting does shine on such souls as his.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, an intimate acquaintance for many years afforded me the opportunity of understanding and appreciating the marked traits of personal character that made our deceased friend and colleague, Col. A. A. WILEY, distinguished among his fellow-men.

A man possessed of his temperament, endowed with an energy that never tired, guided by a well-trained, vigorous, active intellect, would necessarily and inevitably reach high rank with his countrymen. The entrance of Colonel WILEY to Congress was at the most opportune period of his life—ripe with a valuable experience and equipped with useful knowledge. For years he had been a most successful lawyer at his home in Montgomery, Ala., easily ranking with the foremost lawyers of his State. As a legislator in both branches of the general assembly of Alabama he acquired a knowledge of legislation and parliamentary work that made the broader work and duties of a Congressman of easy performance to him. He was thus equipped when he entered Congress.

Many of the great national questions that came up for discussion on the floor of the House were familiar to him, and he was at ease and fluent in such debates. That it was but a short time after his entrance in congressional life before he acquired influence and strength among his colleagues was a matter of no surprise to those of his friends who knew his true worth.

Death came to him at the most important period of his usefulness to his district, his State, and his country. His four terms in Congress brought him to the broad plane of useful American statesmanship. No public man in Alabama had a more promising future, with stronger assurance of full realization of hopes of future political preferment, than Colonel WILEY. Energy, industry, and ability, supplemented with a love of method and system in all he did, were the leading characteristics of Colonel WILEY. His mind yearned for the true analysis and solution of difficult problems of political, legal, or governmental science and policy, and it was a labor of love to him to work and toil.

In his convictions he was honest, sincere, and immovable. Being a generous man by nature, affable and courtly in his manner and address, I have found but few among the public men of our country more gentle and kindly tolerant of the views and feelings of those who differed with him than was Colonel WILEY. It grieved and pained him to wound anyone, and when conscious that he had done so a full and unstinted apology gave his heart pleasure.

His methodical habits and his love for training and preparedness naturally led Colonel WILEY to participate in military affairs. The Military Committee of the House was his preference when he entered Congress, and at his death he was one of the most laborious as well as distinguished members of that important committee.

He was appointed lieutenant-colonel by President McKinley in the Spanish-American war, and he is justly credited with having performed, in connection with his military duties, most valuable service in preparing a code for the regulation of the island of Cuba. I have no doubt that it was while in the discharge of his duties in Cuba that he contracted the disease that finally brought about his death.

In the walks of private life and in the circle of his personal friends, the light of his inmost life was fully revealed. Affectionate, generous, and sociable, he loved the society of his friends. His attachments were sincere and deep and without dissimulation. He was hostile by temperament to deceit or sycophancy, and scorned the greetings of the insincere flatterer. Colonel WILEY had his trials and struggles in early young manhood, and he never forgot the man who extended to him a helping hand. His pathway was not strewn with the roses of life that fall from the hands of strong and influential friends. At the close of the great civil war between the States he was but a boy. Poverty, with its harsh trials, confronted him. Possessed of the buoyant spirit of a manly boy, with an undaunted courage he grappled the situation and eagerly pressed forward with an outstretched hand to grasp the goal of life success. Discouragements must come and always come to such a man in his contest in life, but with Colonel WILEY disappointments found no abiding place in his make-up. They cast no shadows across the path of his life, but served to strengthen and encourage him in the life work before him. He made up his mind to come to Congress and one or more defeats did not discourage him.

In my close personal relations with Colonel WILEY I found him to be preeminently a broad-minded man, patriotic in all of his noble impulses and absolutely free from the touch of a sectional feeling. He was in the truest sense a first-class southern man, not narrow or governed by impracticable or unwise policies, but faithful in his love to the great events and wonderful history of the South, in war and peace. He by his speeches and acts held up the bright light of hope to the people of the South, the great industrial and agricultural growth and wealth that awaited us in the near future that would give us our pristine glory and power in the Union of the States and the councils of the Republic. In his public life and utterances it was such broad and patriotic sentiments that ever animated him. It can be truly said of A. A. WILEY that he loved his fellowman. No feeling of envy or jealousy marred or distorted the natural relations of his life. He grieved for those that had a sorrow and rejoiced with those that were happy, and his generous and liberal hand was ready at all hours to extend aid to the poor and the needy.

Colonel WILEY was a modest and retiring man. It was never his desire to thrust himself into the limelight and make himself conspicuous over others. He preferred to do his work and his duty quietly and unobtrusively.

I was with him, Mr. Speaker, often in his last sickness before he left this city. His sufferings were intense, but under the tender and affectionate care of his noble and beloved wife, whose great love had crowned his life with domestic happiness and peace, he bore without murmur or complaint the tortures and pain that racked his body even to death.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is but a feeble portrayal of the character and life of a splendid man—my good friend. His home city of Montgomery, Ala., where he was known well in all the walks of life, honored and loved him in life, and no people, I dare say, in any section of the world could have paid more beautiful, pathetic, and sincere tributes of respect and love to the dead than those noble people in that beautiful southern city paid to their true friend, worthy fellow-citizen, and distinguished Congressman, Col. A. A. WILEY. And Mr. Speaker, he deserved it all.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Mr. Speaker, the world needs strong, brave, sincere men. When a man who is strong, brave, and sincere passes out of the world in the very prime of his powers, in the zenith of his splendid faculties, the world is a loser.

I met ARIOSTO A. WILEY in the committee room. Some mutual taste drew us together. I came to know him; and like every other man who came to know him, I came to like him exceedingly well. If I were to define his character, I should say, first of all, that he was a manly man. He was absolutely incapable of doing a small or dishonorable thing. Such a thing in connection with Mr. WILEY would be absolutely unthinkable. He was a man of the highest honor, the finest tastes, and a gentleman to his finger tips.

Mr. WILEY was an Alabamian, proud of his State, but above and beyond all he was an American. There was nothing sectional about him. He loved the old flag, and he loved with equal devotion each particular star in the splendid constellation which adorns it.

In the Spanish war there was very little opportunity for the display of great military ability. The war did not last long enough and the enemy was of too small importance to really give scope to military genius. But if we had had a great war, if we had met foemen worthy of our steel, if the war had lasted some years, Mr. WILEY would have gone to the front, because he belonged at the front.

I have seen something of military matters myself. I have met and mingled with soldiers a great deal. I think I know one when I see him. I feel absolutely certain that if the opportunity had come, he would have gained great military distinction. I am glad, and I have no doubt he was glad, that the opportunity never came, that there was no great effusion of blood, and that the war passed away in a few days.

Most of us know Mr. WILEY by his speeches in the House. He was a convincing orator; he made an excellent argument.

I know him and remember him better by his conversation. I never knew a man of better colloquial abilities; I never knew a man who could keep up a sustained conversation more interestingly. He was a charming talker, and always along elevated lines. No coarse jokes, no improper allusions ever marred the splendid diction of his conversation, and I learned to like him for it, as probably every man did who became intimately acquainted with him. One of the pleasures that a man enjoys in Congress is the opportunity to get acquainted with splendid men like our departed friend. It is a legacy which I shall gladly carry with me when I go away to my Indiana home. I like to remember the kindly words; I like to remember the pleasant greetings; and WILEY always had a kindly word and a pleasant greeting.

You had to know him very well to understand him well. He was hardly a hail-fellow well met. He did not slap men on the shoulders and call them by their Christian names, but maintained a proper dignity; but behind that dignified exterior was a heart of gold, and you had only to get well enough acquainted to find it.

I believe that cases like this bring us into personal relationship, make us better friends, and when it comes to speak of a departed brother of whom we know and like, there is a touch of nature that makes the whole world kin. We forget everything else and remember only the pleasant episodes.

In this connection I may say there is too much talk about eastern men, western men, northern men, and southern men; the term "American" is a far more appropriate term, and that is what Mr. WILEY was. I never knew a more patriotic man, a man more thoroughly in love with his country; I never knew a man of higher ideals in regard to his country. I am glad I knew him. I am glad to have had the pleasure of his acquaintance. I have felt that I am a better man for it. I have felt that my own ideals have been raised. I feel that there has been an uplifting influence in my life, as no doubt there has been in reference to other people. Let us emulate his virtues; let us, like him, use what there is in us of strength and power in promoting the best interests of our whole common country.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire on this quiet, holy Sabbath to join my colleagues in paying my feeble tribute to the memory of ARIOSTO A. WILEY, who, in the midst of a useful career, was stricken down by the ruthless hand of Death.

Colonel WILEY was a native Alabamian. He was born in Barbour County in 1848, and his whole life was spent within the borders of the State of his birth. He graduated from Emory and Henry College, Virginia, in 1871.

In early life he settled at Montgomery, Ala., in the practice of law, and was the partner of Hon. Samuel F. Rice, at one time chief justice of the Alabama supreme court. Colonel WILEY was devoted to his profession, and his tact, industry, and ability always commanded for him splendid fees and retainers. He loved politics, and was for many years a member of one or the other branch of our state legislature.

I first met him in 1884, when I was a member of the legislature from Cherokee County, and he from Montgomery. I was then a youthful member from the mountains, and he from the capital city of our State. At first I thought him cold, haughty, and repulsive, but as I learned to know him better, I found him possessed of as warm a heart as ever throbbed in response to the pulsations of friendship.

After serving with him one session in the legislature our meetings were infrequent, and my association with him was only occasional until we met in the Halls of Congress. Here I learned to know him well, and what was before merely an acquaintanceship grew into the closest and warmest friendship.

As a lawyer Colonel WILEY was the equal of any; as an official he was earnest, honest, and courageous; and as a friend he was loyal, generous, and true. In energy he was tireless. At the bar he made the cause of his client his own, and as a representative of the people the zeal and energy with which he always looked after their interests was the subject of admiration by all. He was scholarly and logical in debate and would champion the cause of the poorest client or humblest constituent with just as much earnestness and study as he would that of the richest corporation that poured its fees into his till.

Some of the most eloquent speeches that I heard him deliver on the floor of this House was when he was seeking justice for the humblest of his constituents. He liked the tented field, and when our flag was insulted by Spain he was among the first to tender his services to wipe out the stain. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel of one of the immune regiments enlisted during the war with Spain, and served as such in Cuba. After the war had ended he remained some time in Cuba and rendered efficient serviee in restoring civil government to that unfortunate island.

In whatever position he was placed he was always a full-grown man, and one whom his people ever delighted to honor. In municipal, state, and federal relations he was always a fearless, aggressive, independent leader. In Alabama's battle for our new constitution, he took a prominent part. In any struggle, civic or military, he was always in the vanguard and never skulked with the laggards or camp followers. He was truly a man who did things. His life was one of quick, active, intelligent motion.

In his eloquent address on the acceptance of the statue of Hon. John James Ingalls, Colonel WILEY said:

> A world-renowned Roman orator once declared: "I hold that no man deserves to be crowned with honor whose life is a failure. He who only lives to eat and drink and accumulate money is a failure. The world is no better for his being in it. He never wiped a tear from a sad face, never kindled a fire on a frozen hearth. I repeat, with emphasis, he is a failure. There is no flesh in his heart. Let no such man be honored."

This quotation aptly applies the views of my departed friend as to his own life. He was ambitious and sought honors, but not without meriting them. He knew his powers and his ability, but he did not expect his people to blindly worship that ability while he folded his hands and rendered them no service in return.

His constituents were quick to appreciate the ability of Colonel WILEY, and, I believe, never allowed him to be defeated for any office to which he aspired. He was for many years a member of the city council of Montgomery, and in this position, as well as all others, he showed himself worthy the confidence of those who intrusted him with power.

Had he lived, he would no doubt have remained in this body as long as he desired. His memory is embalmed in the hearts of his people as one who "knew his duty, and, knowing, dared to do." We mourn him dead, but "his deeds do live after him."

> Now is the stately column broke,
> The beacon light is quenched in smoke;
> The trumpet's silver voice is still,
> The warder silent on the hill.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I first knew Colonel WILEY when he came to Congress, at first only generally. During the last years of his life I knew him well, as a result of the intimate relationship that comes to those on committees, engaged in the same line of work, where the parties engaged are desirous of doing their full duty. This he always was desirous of doing.

If I can, in the few minutes I shall speak this afternoon, say anything that may add to his fame or of gratification of his family, it will be a pleasure to me. Friendships are not always results of time. With some it takes years of intimacy to feel that you are acquainted, that you are friends; with others only a short time is needed until you are bound together by the warmest ties of friendship. It is not for me to speak of his past life; that is well and eloquently done by his colleagues, but I would like to say a word of Colonel WILEY first as a man. He was one of the most genial, companionable, and interesting personalities that it has ever been my fortune to meet. In talking with those who went to Manila with him on that trip I have found without exception universal praise for his courtesy and kindness of heart and genius for entertaining his friends and grappling them to him with hooks of steel.

One of these men from my own State, who has met men from all parts of the world, expressed himself to me before Colonel WILEY's death that never had there been a man to whom all of the party were more attracted than to Colonel WILEY, and so, continuing the remark made by my friend from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON], I want to say that he possessed that other rare quality which made his fellow-men love him.

Colonel WILEY was a patriot. Born in the South, in his early youth, when the country was torn and distracted with all the horrors of internecine strife, he never allowed these scenes and experiences to cause him to love his country less. Always loyal to his people and his State, in a larger sense he was devoted to the Republic.

As a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, there never was a measure brought before that committee which he conceived would be for the honor, dignity, benefit, or glory of his country that he was not an eloquent, earnest, and persistent champion of the measure. In that great committee, over which I have the honor to preside, politics rarely enter. We try to consider the measures, not upon their political bearing in any sense, but with Colonel WILEY, almost above any other member of the committee, it never was a question of party, but always a question of country.

He was a patriot, because during his middle life, when the war broke out, he left the people he loved at home to brave the dangers of a tropical climate and face a foreign enemy, and he remained under the flag until his services were not longer needed. It was a matter of pride to him. He bore an honorable part in bringing the blue and the gray together under the flag, battling for a common cause. No longer can any patriot draw the line between the sections of our common country.

As a Member of the House of Representatives he was always earnest and diligent, eloquent and able. As a man I can only say that if the world were inhabited only by such men as Colonel WILEY we would all be happy. I have never, in all my relations with men here, met a man who had so remarkable an influence with his fellow-men. We had, in the committee, disputes that looked as though they might lead to bad feeling with the membership; yet Colonel WILEY was always a peacemaker. While not giving up a single particle of his convictions, he stilled the passions and established peace.

To me it was a great sorrow and a great surprise when the telegraphic news of his death flashed over the country. I am glad it was not my privilege to see him after he was stricken with illness. I remember him as a buoyant, splendid, physical man that impressed everyone with whom he came in contact with his strength, both mentally and physically; and to me he will always remain in the prime of his life and the vigor of his manhood. I hope as years go by his virtues may be emulated, and that other sons of the Southland may come here bearing with them the same high type of statesmanship and manhood that was possessed by our deceased friend.

I want to say, in conclusion, carrying a little further what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said, "There is no death;" let us hope, as we who believe in the Christian religion do hope and believe:

> There is no death! The stars go down
> To rise upon some fairer shore.

And in the great beyond, with the recognition of friends there, may we meet this great and good man who has gone before.

Mr. DENBY. Mr. Speaker, in the natural course of events, we are called upon all too frequently to mourn the loss of dear friends. In Congress the kindly custom prevails of giving to surviving associates of Members who have passed away the opportunity to put on record in enduring form their estimate of their former associates.

Seldom, indeed, do we approach consideration of the character and achievements of any Member who had so clear a title to our respect because of those qualities of heart and brain which endear men to their fellows as was the case with our late colleague from Alabama, in whose honor we have met to-day.

Men may not justly be judged merely upon the record of their actual material achievments, but rather by the standard of their attitude toward humanity and their influence upon their generation. The question is not so much what has our departed brother done, but how has he borne himself as a man and a citizen? How has he met the requirements of daily life and the unceasing demands of his environment? Summing it all up, the inquiry is simply, Is the world better because he has lived? We are fortunate to-day in that from whatever angle we approach the life and character of ARIOSTO A. WILEY we find fitting occasion for words of praise and kindliness.

He was born in the State of Alabama—which through his long life he served so well—thirteen years before the outbreak of the great war. He lived through the dark period after the war and long enough to see the proud South raise her head proudly again from the ashes and begin that splendid career of development and progress, in the midst of which she is going forward to-day. All the bitterness left by the war, in the midst of which he lived when a young and impressionable man, seemed to have no warping effect upon his cheerful and kindly disposition. He came to Congress a courteous and charming southern gentleman, and his presence and his labors here did much to prove that the Nation's scars have disappeared and that we are again a united people in thought and heart and purpose.

Representative WILEY was truly a representative of his section and his State. Born in Alabama in 1848, he was educated at the Emory and Henry College, in Virginia, from which he was graduated in 1871. He was admitted to the bar in 1872, and thereafter he practiced law with great success in his home city of Montgomery. For the first eighteen years of his professional life he was associated with an eminent jurist, a former judge of the Alabama supreme court, Samuel F. Rice.

The fact that during the period of life when lawyers ordinarily handle the most trivial matters he was charged with the conduct of many important cases involving large interests, proved his capacity in his chosen profession and justified his rapid rise to the front rank of the local bar. In 1882 he was elected to the house of representatives of the State and gave his legal abilities to the service as chairman of the committee on revision of the laws and member of the committee on corporations. Thereafter, and until called to a broader field of activity, he served almost continuously in the general assembly of the State, and his service was always signalized by the keenest interest in and devotion to the welfare of Alabama. An aptitude for military affairs caused him to take an active interest in the militia, in which for five years he was captain of the Montgomery Mounted Rifles and a member of Governor Seay's staff, where again his knowledge of law stood him in good stead. He served as judge-advocate-general on the staff, with the rank of colonel of cavalry, and later he also served on the staff of Governors Oates, Johnston, and Sanford.

When the war with Spain broke out and the loyal South sprang to the colors as earnestly as did the North, President McKinley issued to Colonel WILEY a commission as lieutenant-colonel of the Fifth Regiment U. S. Volunteer Infantry, one of the immune regiments raised for special service during the war. He received his commission on June 17, the same date on which, ten years later, he died in Washington. Proceeding to Santiago de Cuba with his command, he was appointed by that superb soldier, General Lawton, his chief legal adviser, and subsequently was made civil governor of Santiago.

In this position Colonel WILEY rendered great service to his country by framing a constitution which appears to have met the approval of the people of the province and to have had a marked effect in aiding the permanent restoration of good order. It is enough to say in regard to the notable services rendered by Colonel WILEY during the war with Spain that he was recommended by so distinguished a regular officer as General Lawton for appointment as brigadier-general, a position to which the early termination of the war and the muster out of his command prevented him from being appointed. Thereafter his district in his beloved State manifested its approval of the character and services of its distinguished citizen by electing him to the Fifty-seventh Congress and continuing to return him to Congress until his death.

So reads the life record of ARIOSTO WILEY. It is a bare recital of facts. It does not, nor can we, fittingly characterize the personality through which shone forth a generous and lovable nature. What he did in a public way as a citizen, responsive to every call of duty, we can state, but we can not measure the great good that his mere presence among his fellow-men accomplished, because of his kindness, his courtesy, and his cheerful optimism. The men in Congress who knew him best all bear unvarying testimony to the sweetness and purity of his character and his lofty ideals as a citizen of the Republic.

I take it as an honor to myself and to my State that I am to-day permitted to lay this sprig of northern pine upon the tomb of Alabama's lamented statesman—Representative WILEY.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, when I first knew Representative WILEY he was a member of the Alabama legislature, and I had the honor of serving with him in that splendid body of men. I soon recognized his sterling qualities and his great ability. From that time on until he was elected to the Congress of the United States I watched his career with peculiar pride and interest. He was an earnest man, a man of high purpose, and but few men in my acquaintance could do the mental work and endure the physical strain incident thereto that this man could. He was full of energy and industry and was an untiring worker. Whatever his hands found to do he did it and did it well, and the bright star of a beautiful enthusiasm was ever shining over the path of his labors.

As a lawyer he ranked among the ablest and best of the great bar of Alabama.

Mr. Speaker, it was the ambition of his life to represent his people in this the greatest lawmaking body in the world, and in 1900 his people, with unanimous voice, bestowed upon him the distinguished honor that he had longed for, and in return for this honor he gave to his people the full measure of an able and faithful service.

When I came here, four years ago, he gave me a very cordial greeting and manifested an interest in and friendship for me that I shall never forget. For three years we lived in the same hotel and ate at the same table. He was my warm, personal friend, and my devotion to him grew stronger as my intimate knowledge of him increased and the time of my association with him lengthened. Every throb of his big heart beat loyal to his friends. No taint of ingratitude or unfaithfulness found place in his broad and honest nature. He was a magnetic man, a prince in conversation, and, in fact, one of the most delightfully entertaining men that it has ever been my pleasure to know. He was a logical and eloquent speaker, a very studious man, and no Member of Congress devoted more of his time to study and to his labors here than did this lamented and beloved Alabamian. In my judgment, he overtaxed his strength. Any cause that he espoused had in him an able, earnest, and fearless champion. He was a splendid type of the southern gentleman—courtly, gallant, and brave. He loved the South, and no man living could describe her beauty and glory better than he. He caught the song of her rills and the music of her birds, and these, mingling together, ever sounded in his soul. There was sunshine in his manner, and the bright sparkle of good cheer was always in his eye; and back of it all beat the big heart of a sincere, manly man. He loved life and enjoyed it to the full; he dwelt on its bright side and contributed his full share to the fund of good cheer and happiness of those with whom he came in contact. He was a painstaking, industrious, able, and faithful representative of his people.

Mr. Speaker, we come here from the various walks of life, come in health and strength, and in the whirl of our routine labors seem to forget that—

Death rides on every passing breeze,
He lurks in every flower.

This grim monster is no respecter of persons; the statesman delving into the science of government and pleading for the enforcement of the laws of justice; the minister preaching the gospel unto the least of these, my brethren; the soldier with drawn sword, defending his country; the physician battling with the germs of disease; the teacher with his pupil; the merchant in his store; and the farmer in his field, aye, the mother and infant at the peaceful fireside, all must quit this tenement of clay when the death angel comes. Voices that we heard in this Hall just a little while ago are still, and bright eyes into which we looked are closed forever. Forms that moved in vigor and health here, our friends and colleagues, are cold in the icy arms of Death. Here in the bustle and stir of things, in the midst of a life that is never still, we labor and we lift our voices in advocacy of the measures that we believe to be right, and our words and votes are recorded in the great record of this great lawmaking body. On and on the wheels of national legislation turn. Morning after morning the clear voice of the Speaker is heard:

The House will be in order, and the Chaplain will open with prayer.

Ever and anon in the Chaplain's prayer we hear him invoking God's blessings upon the bereaved ones of another Member of Congress, dead, and we realize the truth of the scripture:

In the midst of life we are in death.

Mr. Speaker, during Mr. WILEY's last illness his loving wife—one of the noblest types of true and beautiful womanhood—the woman who had been his good angel in sunshine and in shadow, was there, lovingly and tenderly ministering to every want. In her and in his manly son Noble, and in his devoted brother OLIVER, who succeeds him here, the star of his affection was fixed and immovable, save by the hand of Death. I believe that he realized that his end was near. Not long before he passed over the river, in a most feeling way he repeated to me the last words of Judge Rice, of Alabama, who was his law partner when he died. He talked of the Judge's hope of immortality, and described him rising from his pillow, exclaiming in animated delight: "The city, the beautiful city."

Mr. Speaker, if the man who loves his fellow-man and adorns his daily life with the jewels of good deeds and contributes all in his power to human happiness, to truth, justice, and right finds eternal rest, my friend, Congressman WILEY, has joined his good friend and former law partner, Judge Rice, in that "beautiful city not made with hands"

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, in attempting to exercise the esteemed privilege accorded me in these memorial ceremonies I remark that the flowers fade, the leaves fall, and men die. But what men are, what they think and say and do, does not, and should not, always die with them.

It was said in the olden time, "Debimur morti nos, nostraque;" that is, "We owe ourselves and all we are and have to death." But with this solemn declaration of the pagan philosopher we can not wholly agree. It is plaintively true that all who live are doomed to die. From that dread decree there is no appeal. But while it is true that the physical man perishes and passes by transmutation into other forms of matter, it is equally true that what he has thought and said and wrought is not always subject to annihilation and oblivion at the hands of the relentless monarch of the tomb. While the tangible and bodily man falls and vanishes from human view, the mental, the ethical, and the executive man continues to live and act in the record he has made. And so to-day, while honoring his name and memory, we would, with melancholy pleasure, briefly enumerate some of the principles, sentiments, and virtues that actuated and adorned the life, and recount some of the services that distinguished the career of our late lamented friend and colleague, the Hon. ARIOSTO APPLING WILEY, who at the time of his death, June 17, 1908, represented as a Member of this illustrious body the second district of the Commonwealth of Alabama.

I say briefly, because I had not the honor and pleasure of an extended or intimate acquaintance with our departed friend. But during the time I knew him and served with him as a member of the Committee of this House on Military Affairs, extending through some months, I was especially impressed with his tranquil dignity of character, uniform but quiet urbanity of manner, and a pronounced gravity of demeanor. I have since supposed that his deep seriousness was superinduced by a sense of declining health and apprehensions of impending dissolution.

His varied literary attainments, his legal acquirements—being a lawyer by profession—his active energy, laudable ambition, punctilious integrity of character, and commanding social position all combined to make him the recipient alike of popular admiration and esteem, and of public honors, trusts, and responsibilities. And so it was for nearly twenty years he was almost continuously a member of the Alabama legislature, serving in both houses of that body and being chairman of the judiciary committees in each; was more than once a delegate to represent his State in the Democratic national convention, and was presidential elector in the national campaign in 1884. In 1898 he was commissioned a lieutenant-colonel of the Fifth Regiment U. S. Volunteer Infantry in the Spanish war, served nearly a year in Cuba, acting the greater part of that time as chief of General Lawton's staff and as civil governor of the eastern Province. Colonel WILEY was elected to the Fifty-seventh, Fifty-eighth, Fifty-ninth, and Sixtieth Congresses, and died in the eighth year of his incumbency in our great National Legislature.

And here I remark that in our estimate it is a distinctive and distinguished honor for any man to represent directly and immediately 200,000, and indirectly and remotely more than 80,000,000 of people in the lawmaking assembly and guiding power of this young but mighty, imposing, and expanding Republic. Our colleague died crowned with that exceptional distinction. And it was a delicate, a beautiful, and significant tribute to his name and memory when his brother, the Hon. OLIVER C. WILEY, was selected by the unanimous voice of his bereaved constituency to serve out the unexpired term for which he had been elected. What a gratifying evidence this is of the esteem in which he was held and of the influence he has left upon those who had known and honored him and whom he had loved and served so well. And thus was illustrated what was said in the beginning, namely, that while the physical man perishes and passes, his example, his deeds, his work, and his worth live after him. The best evidence of a man's merit is the influence he leaves upon the community in which he lives—an influence that may be happily transmitted from generation to generation.

To summarize: Our lamented colleague was a refined and cultured gentleman, a true and trusted friend, an exemplary and leading citizen, an accomplished and successful lawyer, an able and conscientious legislator, an ardent patriot, and a gallant soldier.

Finally, when all is said and done here, when we have rendered the last tributes of love and honor to the memory of our sacred dead, we are prone to philosophize upon what, if any, of another life may yet come to them and eventually to ourselves. But reflection soons tells us that the beginning and end of life are mysteries too deep for human thought to fathom and too inscrutable for human wisdom to illumine. "If a man die, shall he live again?" was the troubled inquiry of the prophet of old. And so it would appear that the infant of an hour has as much definite knowledge of the whence and whither of all things as the profoundest philosopher, propagandist, cosmogonist, or psychologist that has ever lived or ever died. And in our ignorance and blindness we cry out: "Whence did we come and whither are we going?" And the despairing answer comes back: "We know not! We know not! We know not!" And again we cry out: "Where are philosophy and reason? Can they give us no light?" Philosophy and reason? Why, they have encountered the mystery of the origin and end of all things, have made noble and valiant efforts for light, but as often have been baffled and beaten, and have fled the field of inquiry in despair. Is there nothing, then, to light and cheer our darkened way? Yes! Yes! Hope fondly whispers and Christian faith earnestly insists that there is a higher, a better, and more beautiful existence beyond this life. And if there is, as we believe, we trust that the departed spirit of our honored colleague is in that radiant realm—

Where the faded flower shall freshen,
Freshen never more to fade;
Where the shaded sky shall brighten,
Brighten never more to shade.
Where the sun blaze never scorches;
Where the star beams cease to chill;
Where no tempest stirs the echoes
Of the wood or wave or hill.
Where no shadow shall bewilder;
Where life's vain parade is o'er;
Where the sleep of sin is broken;
And the dreamer dreams no more.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, Alabama has been peculiarly stricken in the recent past. Since the beginning of the Sixtieth Congress she has mourned the death of two Senators and a Representative in Congress. Less than a year ago, sir, we met in this Hall to pay tribute to the memory of our venerable Senators, John T. Morgan and Edmund Winston Pettus. To-day we meet to honor the memory of our distinguished colleague, who joined with us in those tributes, but who himself was destined in a short time to follow them to that land of rest and happiness across the dark Valley of Death.

It is not for us, by our poor words, to consecrate to the State and Nation that we love so well the life, works, and character of our late colleague, ARIOSTO A. WILEY, for from his earliest manhood his life, his works, his character, in all that he thought and said, in all that he did, and in the performance of every duty, were consecrated to the State; and it is only left for us, in our weak way, to pay to him a tribute born of our love for the man and inspired by our admiration of his unwavering loyalty to his country and his duty, and his magnificent ability to represent in the highest and noblest manner the people of the whole Nation as well as those of his own district.

Beginning his public services as a representative in the legislature of Alabama from Montgomery County when he was but a young man, he was constantly, up to the time of his death, laboring in the cause of humanity and serving his country with undoubted honesty of purpose and ever-increasing zeal. As naturally as summer follows spring, his eighteen years of splendid service in the state senate and house of representatives of the State of Alabama carried him into the broader fields of legislative endeavor in the Congress of the Nation. His marked legal ability, his splendidly trained mind, and his knowledge of men and of the affairs of state made of him at all times a legislator of unsurpassed ability, while his love of truth and honor led him unerringly in the paths of legislative righteousness so dear to the hearts of the American people. We who served with him know how untiring he was in the service of his constituents. From morning until night he was looking after their interests in the different departments of the Government, before committees, and in the House; and night after night he could be found in his office continuing his labors when others had gone to rest, answering the correspondence of the humblest constituent as carefully and with as much pains as he would that of the most prominent and influential citizen of his district.

But his influence was felt not alone at the bar and in legislative halls. He believed that every American citizen owed to his country military as well as civil service. Applying that theory to himself, he served many years in the National Guard of Alabama. For five years he was captain of a troop of cavalry in Montgomery; and he served with the rank of colonel on the staffs of four governors of the State of Alabama.

Being thus fitted, is it strange that he should have answered the call to arms in 1898? Mr. Speaker, when the explosion in Habana Harbor which carried the Maine and her noble crew to the bottom of the ocean was answered in this country by the sound of the war trumpet, and our martyred President, William McKinley, flung to the breezes the Stars and Stripes and in the name of God and humanity called upon the country for volunteers, the men who had worn the blue, the men who had worn the gray, and their sons met under that banner as brothers, and among them was ARIOSTO A. WILEY offering his services to his country. His ability was at once recognized by the President. He was made lieutenant-colonel of the Fifth U. S. Immune Regiment. In this capacity he served an enlistment of eleven months in Cuba, his ability being recognized to such an extent that he was made the legal adviser of General Lawton and chief of his staff.

His influence in Cuba will probably be felt longest because of the splendid service he rendered that country and the world in the establishment of a civil government for the Eastern Province of that island, where he cooperated with Gen. Leonard Wood in bringing about a modern civil government, in accordance with American ideas, in a country that had known nothing but Spanish oppression and native insurrection for centuries.

It is sad, indeed, to see a life such as his cut off in its prime, and it brings home to us in most forcible fashion the fact that, although our careers are what we make them, we know not the time nor the place of their ending.

It is a source of great gratification to us who knew and served with Colonel WILEY, that the people of his district unanimously selected his distinguished brother, O. C. WILEY, to finish out the term in this Congress to which he himself had been elected. In so doing the people of the second district of Alabama fittingly recognized the worth and ability of our present colleague, while, at the same time, paying a just and deserved tribute to his illustrious brother.

Mr. Speaker, Alabama mourns with the bereaved family of Colonel WILEY, and the whole Nation pays to him a just and deserved tribute for his magnificent service and his sterling character.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, we come to-day to pay tribute to the memory of one whom the Angel of Death has recently removed from among us.

The life and work of our late colleague, Hon. A. A. WILEY, has been dwelt upon by those who have already spoken, so I will only briefly mention a few of the characteristic traits of this distinguished son of our State. No one came within the range of his acquaintance but was impressed with his sympathetic kindliness. So generous and open-hearted was his nature that he almost seemed to radiate kindness, good will, and cheerfulness; for, indeed, he was one who loved his fellow-men as he was in turn loved by them.

Strong, courageous, and manly, he was never so busy that he would not turn aside to say a kind word or do a generous deed. Joined with his kindly sympathy was another characteristic for which he was noted—that of loyalty. Loyal to friend and country, he never failed to respond when either needed his services. Having prepared himself for usefulness to his country in time of stress by long service in the National Guard of Alabama, he early answered the call for volunteers to defend the Nation's honor in the war with Spain. During this brief but trying conflict I met him in Cuba and can bear personal testimony to his bravery and untiring devotion to duty. As legal adviser to General Lawton and chief of his staff, he rendered service to his country of which Alabama has a right to be justly proud.

His work toward establishing the civil government in Cuba in accordance with the principles of enlightened liberty showed him to be possessed of a constructive statesmanship equaled by few men of this generation. His career in the halls of the Alabama legislature and the National Congress was one of energetic usefulness, and the record of his service is praised so high that words can not add to it.

As a man, a soldier, and a statesman his name and fame will be perpetuated in the annals of Alabama and of our country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, ARIOSTO APPLING WILEY, the friend of all those who would be friendly, a man who obeyed Solomon's injunction, "He that hath friends must show himself friendly," and the subject of this sketch, was born in Barbour County, Ala., in November, 1848. He was too young to enter the Confederate army, otherwise, judging him by his whole private and public record, he would have been found carrying a musket for his State, right or wrong, and for the historic cause of local self-government.

His funeral took place in Oakland Cemetery, near the site of the first capital of the Confederacy, Montgomery, Ala., on Saturday, June 20, 1908, his death having come after many days of sickness and suffering at Hot Springs, Va., on the 17th day of June, 1908, and just two days after the nomination by the Republican party of William Howard Taft for the Presidency of the United States. Nothing better illustrates the broad national and American and patriotic character of Mr. WILEY than the fact that this cultured and experienced nominee of an opposing party, even in the moment of success and triumph, turned aside to send this message to the city of Montgomery and to the people of the Second Congressional District of Alabama:

> Colonel WILEY was a patriot and a gentleman, with all the graces of good-fellowship that made him most dear to his friends. * * * I extend my sympathy to his constituents, who are deprived in his death of a most able, worthy, and conscientious Representative in Congress.

At the beginning of his congressional career, at a dinner celebrating his nomination by the Democratic party, Colonel Oates, an officer in the Confederate army, a former Representative in Congress, and later a governor of Alabama, had said:

> WILEY is one of the best fitted men to go to Congress that I ever knew. He will, in my opinion, make an ideal Congressman.

Thus the opinion of a great Republican at the close and of a distinguished Democrat at the opening of his political career as a federal legislator were in remarkable and true accord. Before coming to Washington he had had experience and training as a legislator, having been, since 1882, almost continuously in the house or the senate of the Alabama legislature, and having there taken and held a prominent place, as was demonstrated by the fact that he was chairman of the judiciary committee in both branches of the state lawmaking body.

The confidence of his people in him was further shown by the fact of his choice by them as a delegate to two national Democratic conventions and as a presidential elector.

He became a Member of this august body at the convening of the Fifty-seventh Congress, and was reelected to the Fifty-eighth, Fifty-ninth, and Sixtieth Congresses, the last time defeating a strongly organized opposition by a vote of nearly two to one, although in bed sick and unable either to go home to "meet his enemies in the gate" or to carry on a campaign by correspondence. I am glad that it was I who had the honor of recommending him to the Speaker for appointment on the two committees—on the Militia and on Military Affairs—and he did good service in both places, having, prior to his entrance into this body, had much experience and equipment by long and sympathetic identification with the national guard and the United States Army.

He was first a captain of a cavalry troop of the Alabama National Guard and later a lieutenant-colonel commanding the second regiment of infantry of the Alabama National Guard, and still later served in Cuba as lieutenant-colonel of the Fifth Alabama, U. S. Army, being one of the so-called "immune regiments." Here his energy, knowledge, and efficiency recommended him to General Lawton, who made him his chief of staff. His knowledge of law and of military affairs naturally suggested his appointment as governor of the Eastern Province in Cuba, in which position he did valuable work of a constructive and reconstructive character.

His identification with military affairs was made all the more complete and strenuous by the fact that one of his boys had chosen arms as a profession and career—Lieut. Noble J. Wiley, Fifth Artillery, U. S. Army.

Colonel WILEY graduated from Emory and Henry College, Virginia, and went soon afterwards to the bar, having meanwhile studied law. Like so many southern men soon after the war he took up his life-work penniless. It is said that when he moved to Montgomery and "hung out his shingle" he had just $30, and that yet he never wrote home for more, but managed to forge his own way from this start without further financially embarrassing his family.

His marriage to Miss Noble, of Montgomery County, counted for much in his happiness and success. No man had a sweeter, more attractive, or more aidful and sympathetic helpmate. It is one of the regrets of my life that, although appointed by the Speaker as one of the congressional committee to attend his funeral cortege, I was not able to be present and personally speak a weak but sincere and earnest word of condolence and sympathy to this distressed and widowed lady. I was far away at Pine Bluff, Ark., where I had been engaged to deliver a lecture.

ARIOSTO WILEY was earnest, life-loving, full of geniality, fond to extravagance of wife, son, grandchildren, and friends; open-hearted and open-handed to a fault.

Energy and "diligence in business," the virtue recommended by St. Paul, were perhaps his salient characteristics. He was a "human steam engine." While he preached nothing concerning a strenuous life, he lived it. He was simply untiring in his attention to his constituents' letters, wants, and calls, and to the detail work for them in the departments. His friends he served to the full length of his cable tow, and sometimes to its stretching. The minister who read the service over his grave referred feelingly "to his ability to make friends and to hold them." This best and most useful of all abilities he possessed in an exceptionally high degree. Other abilities he was not lacking in. The same minister—the Rev. Charles A. Stakeley—spoke of him as a "pillar which had fallen—a pillar of good deeds, of humanity, of brains, of leadership." His death has left a void in his city, his State, and in this body, and a heartache, never to be wholly cured, for his friends and his family.

The sun shone brightly on the day of his funeral, as it is apt to do on the funeral days of any of us, for nature takes no note of our births or deaths. It concerns itself not with us. And yet a generous human life is not utterly insignificant—far from it. In a moral and mental sense it is more significant than sun or stars, because it long outendures material things in that part of duration which we call "eternity," if not in that part of duration which we call "time." I have an indestructible faith in the sweet doctrine of the author of Annabel Lee, the doctrine of the inseparability of immortal souls. This is the sole rational solace of wife, child, brother, or friend.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota:

Though modest, on his unembarrassed brow
Nature has written "Gentleman."

No one could have been associated with our late colleague, Col. A. A. WILEY, and not fail to have for him a sincere personal regard and a profound respect for his character and manliness. It was my privilege to know him as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House, and from the first, I think, we all realized that his personal qualities and his extended and varied experience would not only be a source of enjoyment to his associates, but also of continuing and increasing value to his country. In addition, we always knew that his convictions were well grounded, and firm as the everlasting hills, and that he could always be depended upon to stand for what he conceived would be of lasting and general benefit to his countrymen. He was ever ready to devote himself to the cause in which he believed, whether in the field, in the forum, in the legislative halls, or in the seclusion of important work of the committees of which he was a member. But wherever he would be found and whatever his occupation, he always displayed those qualities of manliness and patriotism which won so strongly for him our sincere personal respect and affection.

The membership of this House is so large and the mass of work before it so great and the pressure for action so tremendous that the vast majority of its membership always realizes that the best and indeed only proper way to perform the important duties of our high office is to diligently and intelligently attend to the various details as they may arise in the daily business which comes to us. The true and sincere Representative is aware of this and daily adds his mite of duty well done to the volume of the similar services of his colleagues. This constitutes the bulk of the legislation and administration which control the activities and destinies of our 90,000,000 of people. The people do not always comprehend the immense importance and amount of those duties, many of them trivial, yet which must be performed, if our people shall be satisfied and encouraged to continue in their pathway of progress and prosperity. Colonel WILEY appreciated this duty and necessity to the fullest extent and devoted himself assiduously and conscientiously to the real needs of his people. He was proud of their achievements and wonderful successes, and he labored unceasingly that all the assistance the Federal Government could render in its various branches and departments should be made available to those under his supervision. He was equally ready to devote himself for other sections or individuals wherever he could serve them in this broad land. This liberality of action and generosity of spirit gradually gave him an influence and standing among his colleagues which must have been a source of great satisfaction to himself and redounded always to the welfare of his own people; because, after all, in most cases it is the real service to the people which will commend the Representative to his own constituents at home and to his colleagues in the House.

The abiding memories of our associates when they depart from us are not always from the public and official work they may do as for the qualities of themselves which they contribute to our membership. It is here that Colonel WILEY will long leave his impress upon those of us who were associated with him intimately within the committee room or less closely upon the floor. His constant courtesy and unfailing kindliness and good nature, his frankness and manliness and courage, his broad and liberal views of life and duty, and his lofty ideals of private and public character and service gave him always a position among his fellows of increasing respect and tender affection.

Stricken in life's prime, in the fullness of a splendid usefulness and fame, he left to his family a heritage "more precious than gold and a monument more enduring than brass."

When to last sleep we give ourselves away,
And in a dream, as in a fairy bark
Drift on and on through the enchanted dark
To purple daybreak, little thought we pay
To that sweet, bitter word we knew by day.
We are clean quit of it, as is a lark
So high in heaven no human eye can make
The thin, swift pinion clearing through the gray.

Mr. ELLERBE. Mr. Speaker, we come this morning to pay a last tribute to one who, less than a year ago, walked among us overflowing with energy, shedding on all around him the genial rays of his personality.

A man ambitious to achieve, not because of self-interest, but because he was the Representative of a people who had honored and trusted him, and who looked to him for the preservation of the best interests of the State he loved and served. Even while Colonel WILEY lay upon his couch of pain here in Washington his constituents were proving their love and appreciation by giving him an overwhelming majority over those who sought his place.

That love and approbation must have been sweetest balm to him in the hours when his very soul was tried with suffering. Colonel WILEY has been called the "ideal Congressman," and the title was earned by the broad statesmanlike qualities of the man, not by success in the usual political methods. He did little campaigning, it is said. Instead he devoted his time to the accomplishment of benefits for his district and State, and his people recognizing that deeds meant more than words, said to him again and again at the ballot box—

Well done, thou good and faithful servant.

Of Colonel WILEY's executive ability there can be no doubt. Wherever he went it was recognized and used.

Responding to his country's first call for arms after the tragedy of the Maine, he was sent to Cuba as lieutenant-colonel of the immune regiment intended for immediate service. But after Santiago was captured the soldier was once more merged into the legislator, and Colonel WILEY was commissioned to draw up the code of laws established in that Province. Upon his return from Cuba he again took up his public career. It would have been almost impossible for a man of Colonel WILEY's temperament and talents to have avoided the field of politics.

In Washington his friends included all who knew him, from the President and President-elect to the poorest office seeker who came asking favors, which, when possible, were always granted.

Here he lived and labored until stricken by the hand of disease.

Poets for ages have sung of the sadness of death when it comes to a man full of life and vigor, ready and willing to do a man's part in the world of men.

Yet the Greeks personified death by a beautiful boy crowned with immortal youth, and, somehow, that ideal seems fitting. It is more glorious to pass from the world ere the hand of Time has dimmed the eye or rendered the footstep unsteady; more glorious to pass into the land where each shall in fullest measure achieve his best ambition while that ambition is still thrilling his entire being.

Our friend, the soldier-statesman, has answered "the one clear call," and his bark has set forth to sea, but his life is the heritage of those he has left behind. The memory of his genial nature will be with us until to us, as to him, it comes, that "the golden bowl shall be broken and the silver cord be loosed."

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, let me add a respectful tribute to the many splendid eulogies on our departed friend; eulogies by those who knew him best. My acquaintance with Colonel WILEY commenced with the opening of this Congress, in the December of 1907, in the Committee on Military Affairs. I was not long in his company until I appreciated his many manly qualities of mind and heart and his sincere and earnest desire as a legislator to promote right legislation.

I discovered early that he was a man of deep sympathy for his fellows and high ideals. Furthermore, his ready grasp of subjects under discussion in the committee and his concise and lucid presentation of his ideas impressed me from the first with the conviction that Colonel WILEY was not only strong in the ethical qualities, but a well-rounded and matured mental athlete.

The able and accomplished gentlemen of the Alabama delegation who have preceded me to-day have given a comprehensive recital of the successful public career of Colonel WILEY, to which I can add nothing. What I hope to say is that his example as a public man; his devotion to his people and his native State; his scope of vision to embrace his whole country in patriotic love; his courage to do the right, as he had knowledge to know the right, make his untimely death a calamity to his State and country.

We have never had in this country too many men of heart and brains and morals and courage in public life, and at no period in our history have men of this type been more needed than now. At no time in our history has there ever been a more urgent demand for just men of courage, patriotism, and ability on the floor of Congress.

It was our own poet of patriotism, Fitz-Greene Halleck, who wrote, in Marco Bozzaris, this pathetic and heartrending couplet:

Come to the bridal chamber, Death!
Come to the mother's when she feels
For the first time her first-born's breath! * * *
And thou art terrible!

But more terrible is the loss of a fully equipped man, mentally and morally, because his loss is not only to the family, the wife, the child, but to the State. The one loss to the other is as the rosebud compared with the full-blown rose, grown fragrant and beautiful in God's sunshine. And the example of a well-rounded man, of power and influence for the good of his fellow-man, does not attach to the new-born child.

One of the greatest of Athenian philosophers said:

Most of all, fellow-citizens, if your sons ask whose example they shall imitate, what will you say? For you know well it is not music, nor the gymnasium, nor the schools that mold young men. It is much more—the public proclamation, the public example. If you take one whose life has no high purpose and crown him in the theater, every boy who sees it is corrupted. Beware, therefore, Athenians, remembering posterity will rejudge your judgment, and that the character of a city is determined by the character of the men it crowns.

Two thousand years have elapsed since this classic was uttered, and it is still vital and valuable. The hope and ambition of our young men of to-day are fostered and fed by the character of the men the people of this Republic send into our highest legislative body. Colonel WILEY's example is a potent teacher to the young men of his district and his State. Example teaches without a tongue. It is silent, but its action for good is more forcible than words, however eloquent.

And I must not fail to commend Colonel WILEY's patriotism. He won his eagles in the war with Spain, but his patriotism was in harmony with the humane theory that the future of this country depends more upon the virtue and purposes of the people than upon a bannered army with shotted guns. On this topic let me dwell until I close this modest tribute to this prescient and beloved son of Alabama.

In the throes of human contention and fierce ambition came that mighty conflict of 1861–1865, from which a new Nation was born, and now, after long years, when the bitterness of strife has vanished, and we can calmly recount the common deeds of valor and devotion, the immortal flower song of the young English poet, James Collins, of over a century and a half ago, comes as a sweet solace to blossom in our hearts and lives:

How sleep the brave who sink to rest,
By all their country's wishes blest.
When spring with dewy fingers cold
Returns to deck each hallowed mold,
There honor comes a pilgrim gray
To bless the turf that wraps their clay.

Never before has there been such a spectacle in all the ages, since history was born out of the womb of the dead centuries, as when on Memorial Days, with the rose and the lily, North and the lotus and the magnolia, South, the men who wore the blue and the men who wore the gray clasp hands in fraternal kinship, remembering that God is good, and consecrating themselves to fraternity and unity and a mighty future.

It was Charlotte Corday who said that—

All true patriots will meet in the next world.

And Acton, a much greater prophet of human destiny, says:

No nation can expect to prosper and become great without ardent and devoted patriotism.

And let us, here in this historic Chamber, reconsecrate ourselves to that patriotism that was always so fervently typified in our dead friend—a statesman whose association and friendship added to our joys of living, and whose character and example gave us hope for higher ideals in government.

Mr. COOPER of Texas addressed the House. See Appendix.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama was called to the chair.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, the Hon. ARIOSTO APPLING WILEY made his advent into federal politics at the beginning of the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, on the first Monday in December, 1901. He brought with him a long and successful experience in the public affairs of his State, and his subsequent highly creditable conduct fully justified the wisdom of his constituents in retaining him as their Representative until the end of his earthly career, which occurred on June 17, 1908.

Our deceased friend was born November 6, 1848, at Clayton, in the county of Barbour, in the State of Alabama. When 1 year of age he moved with his parents to Troy, Pike County, in that State, and there the son was reared to manhood. He received a classical education, having been graduated at Emory and Henry College, Virginia, an old and renowned institution, in June, 1871. Soon thereafter he read law, was admitted to the bar, and located in the city of Montgomery, the capital of his State, and there he began the practice of law in 1872. Early in his professional career he became the partner of the eminent jurist and celebrated wit, Judge Samuel F. Rice, formerly the chief justice of the supreme court of Alabama. This partnership lasted eighteen years, and until it was terminated by the death of Judge Rice.

The ability and splendid equipment of our friend, whose untimely departure we now lament, enabled him in almost the beginning of his work as a lawyer to be trusted with many important matters and litigation celebrated in the court annals of his State. He was several times a member of the legislature of Alabama, having been a member of the house of representatives and of the senate, and he was at all times while there a conspicuously industrious, able, useful, and influential public servant, and he left his impress upon many of the laws of his native and beloved Commonwealth.

The love of our friend WILEY for the law was hardly stronger than his love for the military, for he was possessed of the martial spirit and admired the glory of the field as intensely as the renown of the forum. He was at one time judge-advocate-general in the state military establishment, and afterwards served as its inspector-general and then twice as its chief of ordnance. When the war between the United States and Spain had been begun, President McKinley, recognizing the valuable military training and superior qualifications of Colonel WILEY, appointed him lieutenant-colonel of the Fifth Regiment of United States Volunteer Infantry, one of the so-called "immune regiments" organized under special act of Congress.

On June 17, 1898, he went with his command to Santiago de Cuba, his regiment arriving there just after the battle of San Juan Hill. He had been there only a short while when General Lawton, of the United States Army, the commander of that department, appreciating his extensive military experience and his superior attainments, appointed him his chief legal adviser.

Subsequently Colonel WILEY was assigned to the duty of acting as civil governor of Santiago. While in this position he framed a constitution that pleased the people of that Province, and tended to harmonize all discordant elements among the Spaniards and Cubans there. He organized the courts, and contributed more than any other man to the restoration of law and order in the eastern part of the island of Cuba. General Lawton was so much impressed with Colonel WILEY's qualifications and good work that he recommended his appointment to the office of brigadier-general, but the war ended before the recommendation could be acted on by the President. After eleven months' service in behalf of his country and away from home and loved ones, he was mustered out when his country no longer needed his services as a soldier.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a brief summary of the salient facts in the public life of our distinguished friend until he came and took his place in this body as the Representative of the people of the Second Congressional District of Alabama. What I shall say of his career here shall be no more than a short statement of a part only of his labors and accomplishments in behalf of the people of his district, State, and country.

He was always thoughtful, industrious, and diligent in behalf of his immediate constituents, who so often and so signally delighted to honor him.

When Colonel WILEY came to Congress there was not a rural free-delivery mail route in his district. At the time of his death there were more than a hundred established through his efforts. He succeeded in having a soil survey of about one-third of his district made under the auspices of the state and federal authorities. His diligence resulted in numerous agricultural experiments for the benefit of the great farming interests of his district. He secured liberal appropriations by Congress for the Alabama River and other navigable waters in his district.

He introduced and had passed a bill that gave relief to nearly a thousand homesteaders and their families on public lands which had become involved on account of the old land grant by Congress to aid in the construction of the Mobile and Girard Railroad. I have recounted but a small part of his services to his immediate constituency. He rendered to his people prompt and efficient service in their multitudinous private matters before Congress and before the several executive departments of the Government.

Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered gratefully by the surviving Confederate soldiers that through the efforts of our lamented friend a former distinguished Representative in this House, afterwards the governor of Alabama, and after that one of the old Confederate soldiers commissioned by President McKinley as a brigadier-general of the United States Army in the volunteer service, William C. Oates, was appointed by President Roosevelt to locate and to have the graves of Confederate soldiers who died in northern prisons appropriately marked.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, he was a faithful and well-nigh a constant attendant upon the sessions of this House. He never neglected his duties before the committees of which he was a member. He was a conscientious and wise legislator, and did much good in constructive effort, particularly in the enactments pertaining to the military establishment. The proceedings of his committee, his conduct, and his votes in the House furnish ample evidence of his great usefulness and witness his contributions to the legislation affecting the welfare of the country.

Shortly before his death his people selected him for the fifth time as their Representative in Congress, and thereby accorded to him the indorsement that this faithful servant richly deserved.

Here in this body his uniform urbanity, his ability, natural and acquired, and devotion to duty won for him a deserved and enviable reputation and the esteem of his associates. A conspicuous attestation of the great respect in which he was held was the telegram of sympathy on account of his death which was sent by Mr. Taft, who was then Secretary of War and who will be inaugurated President on the 4th of next month. With your indulgence, I shall read this telegram:

WASHINGTON, June 17, 1908.

The ADVERTISER, Montgomery, Ala.:

I am greatly shocked to hear of the death of Colonel WILEY, your Congressman. Colonel WILEY was a patriot and a gentleman, with all the graces of good fellowship that made him most dear to his friends.

He went with us on the Philippine party in 1905 and was beloved by all. He honored me with his warm friendship, and his death is a great personal loss.

I extend my sympathy to his constituents, who are deprived by his death of a most able, worthy, and conscientious Representative in Congress.

WILLIAM H. TAFT.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a just tribute from the gentleman who is now the foremost American citizen. No higher encomium can be pronounced than to say of our friend who has gone to the undiscovered country that he was "a patriot and a gentleman."

Now, Mr. Speaker, you will permit me to indulge in some observations of a more personal nature. I was born in the same county where our distinguished friend who has gone from amongst us first saw the light, and was reared within less than 30 miles of the scene of his early youth. It was my good fortune to know him intimately ever since I reached man's estate. I treasure most fondly and as a precious jewel the memory of this fact, and, therefore, the duty I perform here to-day is most melancholy to me. From time to time, Mr. Speaker, during my experience in this House I have had occasion to speak on the life, character, and public services of one friend, then another friend, and then still another, and again another, but I was not as intimate with any one of them nor indebted to any one of them for a friendship so long and unbroken, and I may say so sweet, as that friendship which existed between ARIOSTO WILEY and myself for many years.

It is a sweet reflection that this friendship was never disturbed for any moment during the long years which it covered. Often have I confided in him for his judgment and advice, and often it pleased me to render him friendly counsel and service. Perhaps I can truthfully say that, with the exception of his good brother who succeeded him in this Congress—and who has made an enviable record here during his short term—I knew ARIOSTO WILEY better than any other friend in Congress. My association with him always yielded me a large profit of pleasure. Accordingly, I can truthfully say that I stand here to discharge the most mournful duty that has ever confronted me while I have been a Member of this House. Would that I could portray what I believe to be a just estimate of this man, and speak a fitting tribute to his life, character, and public services.

Mr. Speaker, let me refer to our friend in some of his other relations in life. He was the devoted son of fond parents. The devoted son became the devoted and affectionate husband and father. His love and solicitude for every member of his family, including his brother who succeeded him here, was touching and exquisitely beautiful. He was gentle, brave, considerate, generous, and unselfish. Often have I heard the prayer fall from his lips:

Out of my selfish self, O lift me up.

I have attempted to portray some of the features of the character and career of this upright, noble man. He was scholarly, gifted with eloquence, and a learned and successful lawyer. He was a brave soldier and a true patriot. He was a wise and useful legislator. He was a valuable and faithful friend. He was a loving son, husband, father, and brother. His nature was gentle and his manner genial, and his heart was full of the tenderest and sublimest sentiments.

He has gone from our midst. He has solved the mystery of death and has unraveled that other mystery which we call life. His manly demeanor furnished an example worthy of emulation. His bright smile is now a fond recollection. His cheerful voice is silenced forever, but abides with us as the memory of a sweet song that has been sung. After life's fitful fever he sleeps. His lofty soul has gone to its reward in the celestial life.

He has done the work of a true man,
Crown him, honor him, love him.
Weep over him tears of women,
Stoop manliest brows above him.
For the warmest of hearts is frozen,
The freest of hands is stilled,
And the gap in our picked and chosen,
The long years may not fill.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR ALLISON.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Clerk will read the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That there be a session of the House at 2 p. m. Sunday, February 21, for the delivery of eulogies on the life, character, and public services of the Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON, late a Member of the United States Senate from the State of Iowa.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 584.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON, late a Member of the United States Senate from the State of Iowa, which occurred at his home in the city of Dubuque, August 4, 1908.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given to pay tribute to his memory.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public service the House, at the conclusion of the memorial exercises of the day, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Speaker, our custom of memorializing Members of Congress who die while in the public service has been commented upon extensively. Differing opinions are entertained in Congress itself, and more widely differing views throughout the country; but as for the observances of this particular hour, no question will be raised, either in or out of Congress, as to the propriety, the fitness, or the willingness of all our countrymen, and, indeed, of other countries, to set apart a portion of this day for opportunity to pay tribute to a statesman who served his country in the United States Senate for a longer period of time than any other man in all our history—WILLIAM B. ALLISON. That fact is prima facie evidence that he deserved the preferment bestowed upon him.

His Creator saved him and prolonged his life for nearly a full decade beyond the mark of three score years and ten—from March 2, 1829, to August 4, 1908—and all mankind, especially his countrymen, are wishing to-day that he could have been spared longer for continuance of his unprecedented usefulness.

Long before I ever held or dreamed of office, he was the first of the really strong men in public life whom I had opportunity of knowing, and he was the most unselfish and genuine friend I ever knew intimately in eminent and exalted station. He was like a father to all young men of his adopted State, and he never lost the loyalty of any one of them who knew him and who had any sense of gratitude.

Coming from Ohio, he fitted well into the hard-working, serious, and patriotic citizenship of Iowa.

Senator ALLISON, like most of us, had to work, and he always had sympathy for those of the younger generation who he knew were born to toil. He never ran ahead of the column. He stood shoulder to shoulder with his colleagues. He did not seek distinguishment, but deserved it always when it was bestowed upon him.

Thus he came into the confidence of all men—by modesty and honesty and industry and tolerance, and by such solicitous and faithful interest in the public welfare that all men the country over finally came to trust him and respect him.

First, a Representative in Congress for eight years; then, after one defeat, our Senator; then came the longest and most useful career in all our history—nearly thirty-six years in the Senate. Early in his senatorial career his ability was most fitly exercised in a sensible and practicable system of government for the District of Columbia, and then in an internal-revenue system that has survived throughout many years of trial with few improvements. Then at last he came to that great and large responsibility and usefulness of shaping tariffs and of appropriating necessary and stupendous sums of money for our foreign and domestic needs and obligations. And in that great capacity and practice he acquired a knowledge and familiarity that surpassed all others in our history.

With a memory that was marvelous, with industry the equivalent of our fathers', and with a mind intent upon equity and justice, he became the trusted counselor in fiscal affairs and in matters of appropriations, so that he was relied upon as the prudential adviser on the most intricate and difficult subjects of our Government.

The late Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, writing his autobiography in 1903, six years before the death of Senator ALLISON, whom he knew well and personally for more than forty years, recorded this significant and deliberate estimate:

His chief distinction has been gained by a service of thirty years in the Senate. He was out of public life two years, and then was elected to the Senate, where he has been kept by the State of Iowa, maintaining the confidence of his State and of his associates in public life. During all that time he has done what no other man in the country, in my judgment, could have done so well. He has been a member of the great Committee on Appropriations for thirty years, most of the time chairman, and for twenty-six years a member of the Committee on Finance. He has controlled, more than any other man, indeed more than any other ten men, the vast and constantly increasing public expenditure, amounting now to more than one thousand millions annually. It has been an economical, honest, and wise expenditure. He has been compelled, in the discharge of his duties, to understand the complications and mechanism of public administration and public expenditure. That is a knowledge in which nobody else in the Senate, except Senator HALE of Maine and Senator Cockrell of Missouri, can compare with him. He has by his wise and moderate counsel drawn the fire from many a wild and dangerous scheme which menaced the public peace and safety.

On the day when this great friend of all of us departed it happened I was traveling in a foreign land. A clergyman of that country, reading from a paper, said aloud, "Another good man gone, ALLISON of Iowa." Observing my concern, although a stranger, he passed to me the paper containing the dispatch that chronicled the sad and sudden information. It was impossible for me to reach our State in time to lay a flower upon the most distinguished and respected grave which the city of Dubuque has ever known, and I am content that I never saw the face of Senator ALLISON after his serene and amiable spirit had departed.

There never was in all our world a kindlier countenance than his when animated with the glow of life and health and with that peculiar cast of gentle and serene nobility. His intelligent and lofty spirit shone always in his faultless face, and his hand was always warm with a fatherly and genial grasp.

It was my great, good fortune to travel with him in many countries of the world and likewise here at home. Even when nearly 80 years of age he was a most interesting companion, better than most of the young men of our day, because his memory was stored with rich and vivid reminiscences of early days and of public life and characters. The proprieties of this occasion do not offer opportunity for details of his conversations, but the memory of them shall never be obliterated.

His life, as indicated by his countenance, was noble and serene, even to the very last of his useful and unselfish service; and save for one or two unspeakable political attacks which emanated from a debauchery of our modern journalism, his great and generous heart was never hurt by hostile comment.

The fertile and appreciative State of his adoption registered most emphatically, not long before his dying hour, pronounced approval of his life and noble services.

After more than forty years of powerful and devoted service to the Nation, thrice bidden to the Cabinet, once almost nominated for the Presidency, he stood at last a master in the consideration of the details of free government amongst a great constituency and amongst his colleagues in the Congress, as a mighty oak tree stands in the midst of a forest, bending at times and bowing with lofty and respectful salutations and with stately and dignified humility, which always and forever in our world betokens wisdom.

We scarcely dare inquire of history what shall finally be the destiny of the republics of our world; but with such lives and characters as the wise and patient one whom we memorialize to-day, the generations of the future centuries may look backward with all confidence upon an example of intellectual industry and honesty, and then look forward with an inspiration that should lift them to a greater and a nobler destiny and, maybe, to an approximately perfect day, when intelligent and modest righteousness may govern in our world.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, my personal acquaintance with Senator ALLISON covered a period of more than fifty years. I met him very shortly after his removal to the State of Iowa, in the city of Des Moines, during the first session of the general assembly ever held in that city. With him I assisted in casting the vote of Iowa in the Republican national convention of 1860 that nominated Abraham Lincoln for the Presidency. During a long portion of these fifty years of which I have spoken I knew the late Senator intimately, and I have often thought that he was most fortunate in the period of the world's history in which his great services were rendered. He was fitted for service in that period by his early life and early associations. He was born and reared and educated in the Western Reserve. Gentlemen who are familiar with the history of that portion of our country know that in that region flourished as in no other portion of the United States, fifty or more years ago, that love of liberty, that discussion of liberty, of equality of men, of their rights under the Constitution and under the broader constitution of God's law, developed later in the terrific strife and in the adjustment of the questions settled later, calling for the exercise of the highest possible genius.

Senator ALLISON'S first political thought came at a time when men were discussing the wisdom of the legislation known to be embodied in what was then called the "Kansas-Nebraska bill," the discussion that brought bloodshed, chaos, and anarchy into one of the Territories that challenged the attention of the world, that led to civil strife and to all of the sanguinary scenes on the battlefields in this country between 1861 and 1865. He did much in the organization of armies, or at least the operation of the great armies that participated in that struggle. He served as a special aide to the governor of Iowa in the raising of troops during the period when 45,000 men were put into the field—40 per cent of the entire military force in that State.

One can readily see that in this sudden transition from the days of peace to the days of war, calling for such great musterings of men, great effort was required.

Senator ALLISON, after the raising of this vast force, took his seat in this House and served continuously for eight years. During that period every question that was involved in the legislation that led to that outbreak of war, to the conduct of that war and to that pacification of the country that resulted from reconstruction of the States after the war occurred, and all were familiar to him, just as was all of that legislation that involved the building up of the resources of the country, prostrated as it was by the expenditure of so many billions of money, and the loss of so much of the vital and wealth-creating forces as this country suffered during the four years.

Senator ALLISON was familiar with all of that earlier legislation. He was familiar with all the efforts resulting in constitutional amendments. He was familiar with all of that legislation that gave us the sinews of war to successfully stand the expenditures of three and one half million dollars in a day. He did much toward that pacification of which I have spoken—that reconstruction of States. It gave to him a wonderful advantage, first, because most of the themes that were discussed were emotional themes in a great degree; the theme of liberty, of equality, of the rights of men under the Constitution and the laws of nature. The necessity of preserving the Federal Union, the certainty of destruction to the individual States should their bond of union be severed, all of these questions, familiar to him, enforced upon him by study, by observation, by feeling, by conscience, enabled him to know and not merely to assume or guess.

There is an idea among men that Senator ALLISON was a man who lacked positiveness, and many anecdotes are told of him, often mere matters of fancy, that would indicate his lack of positiveness. And yet I undertake to say that among all of the distinguished characters that this country has produced, with regard to matters of importance, matters that he had thoroughly weighed, where he had arrived at a conclusion, there was no man more positive than he was. His convictions were to him a certainty about which he had no difficulty or hesitation in giving expression. A cautious man, not giving a hasty conclusion, he waited until the arrival of that condition of thought that was the result of study; and when it came, the conviction was one that he did not hesitate to express.

I think that probably the times in which he lived gave him this power. He was aided in it, too, by the certainties that he had in his mind. The man who lives in public life after this and who desires to know of the stirring events that were in the life of Senator ALLISON must go to the records; research alone can enable him to secure that fund of information that will be the basis upon which conclusions must be built. Not so with the Senator. All these great questions were part of his life; all of these great questions were happenings of his daily occupation. He simply had to indulge in introspection, and stored away in the pigeonholes of his memory were all of these great facts that made him so useful in his day and generation.

It is not claimed by the friends of Senator ALLISON that he was a brilliant genius. But those who knew him best know no man of all his contemporaries was more useful to his country than was the late Senator. He was a man who did not beget love, but who did invariably inspire respect and confidence. The best proof of that is to be found in the almost reverential manner in which his colleagues regarded him. Reference has been made to his unselfishness.

He was always willing that every one of his colleagues should have his full share of whatever there was that he thought might be beneficial to him. He was always ready to cooperate with his colleagues in seeing to it that their rights were observed, and that was one of the secrets of his strength; that was one of the reasons why the people of Iowa were content—aye, more than content; glad—seven times to express their preference that he should be their representative in the Senate of the United States. He never had controversies with his colleagues. He always had the support of them all. Can you think, gentlemen, of any time in all of the history of our State and its political contentions when those gentlemen that served in the Congress of the United States with him were not ready to testify to his worth and ready to assert their content that he should still be the head of the column?

Mr. Speaker, he was a great character; great in his life, useful in his life, and useful in his death; because his life and character will be an inspiration to many and many a youth, teaching him that the door of opportunity here is wide open to all who have the courage and the energy to serve and to achieve.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, Missouri and Iowa are two of the greatest States carved from the Louisiana Purchase. They lie side by side and are bound closely together by ties of interest and of blood. Iowa's first two United States Senators were Missourians—Col. George W. Jones and Gen. Augustus Cæsar Dodge. Both were from Ste. Genevieve, Mo., in which town, when it contained not over 1,000 inhabitants, lived simultaneously six men and boys destined for the high distinction of serving in the Senate of the United States. The most renowned of the six was Col. Thomas Hart Benton. When Senators Jones and Dodge arrived in Washington to take the oath of office, they discovered, to their dismay, that they had lost their credentials. Colonel Benton, the dean of the trans-Mississippi delegation in Congress, who had known them in their youth, smoothed their way by moving that they be admitted without credentials, and it was so ordered.

Though a majority of Missourians are, and always have been, of different political faith from Senator WILLIAM BOYD ALLISON, we have always agreed with Iowans in pride in his blameless life, his high character, his fine ability, and his conspicuous career. He was Missouri's neighbor and her friend.

A well-informed Missourian can not think of Gen. Francis Marion Cockrell without also thinking of Senator WILLIAM BOYD ALLISON, and a well-informed Iowan can not think of Senator ALLISON without also thinking of General Cockrell, because these two eminent men for more than a quarter century were bosom friends and alternated in the powerful position of chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee.

Senator ALLISON served longer in Congress than any other man in the one hundred and twenty years under the Constitution, a total of forty-three and one-half years, eight in the House and thirty-five and one-half in the Senate, thus leading Senator Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont, by a few months. Senator Morrill served ten years in the House and a little over thirty-two years in the Senate. They and Gen. John T. Morgan, of Alabama, are the only men ever elected for six full consecutive terms to the Federal Senate. Death alone prevented Senator ALLISON'S election for a seventh full term, as he had been nominated for that unprecedented honor.

Colonel Benton was the first Senator to serve five full terms. He was for a long time popularly known as "The thirty years' Senator," and when he wrote his invaluable book he entitled it "A Thirty Years' View." His record was never equaled till March 4, 1897, when Senator Morrill began his sixth consecutive term in the House of the Conscript Fathers. Only Senators WILLIAM BOYD ALLISON, Justin S. Morrill, John P. Jones, Francis Marion Cockrell, and John Tyler Morgan have equaled Benton's record for consecutive senatorial service. In addition to these, only John Sherman and William M. Stewart have equaled Benton's length of senatorial service. Missouri is the only State that has given two men thirty years of senatorial service each. Benton was defeated for a sixth term because he quarreled with his party, and Cockrell was defeated for his sixth term because the political complexion of the Missouri legislature was accidentally changed.

In passing, it is both apropos and interesting to state that only three men have served more than thirty years in the House: Judge William S. Holman, of Indiana, General Ketcham, of New York, and Mr. Speaker CANNON. On the 4th of March General BINGHAM, of Pennsylvania, will enter upon his thirty-first year of service in the House.

The chances are that it will be one hundred and twenty years before another man equals Senator ALLISON'S length of service in Congress. In order for his career in that regard to be duplicated, there must be a man worthy of the place and more popular with his party than any other man in his State, and it must also happen that his party holds the legislature continuously—at least control it every time his successor is to be elected. It is rare that one party controls the legislature of a State continuously for thirty years. Indeed, at one of his reelections Senator ALLISON won by only one vote. In Great Britain several men have served longer in the House of Commons than Senator ALLISON has served in Congress, but their system is different. There a man may be elected by any constituency. Here he must be a resident of the State from which he is elected to serve in either branch of Congress. In that way the British always keep their strongest men in the Commons. At the last general parliamentary election the Liberals made such a clean sweep that the leader of the Conservatives was defeated in two districts and was compelled to appeal to a third before he could be elected. It was hinted that he was elected even then only through the connivance of the Liberal chieftains.

For a score of years Senator ALLISON was a presidential possibility, and for a decade a presidential probability. It has been frequently stated that but for the objection of one of the present Senators, who was himself a candidate for the presidential nomination in 1888, Senator ALLISON would have been nominated instead of Gen. Benjamin Harrison that year. At least twice was Senator ALLISON pressed to accept a Cabinet portfolio. He refused the tempting offers.

In the summer of 1899 I had the extraordinary and highly prized experience of conversing with two illustrious Americans now gone to their reward—Hon. James Harlan, of Iowa, the last man nominated for a Cabinet position by Abraham Lincoln, and Judge John H. Reagan, of Texas, then the only survivor of the cabinet of Jefferson Davis.

I happened to speak in the beautiful little city where Senator Harlan resided. After the speaking, somebody told me at the hotel that the Senator, then a feeble man, was pleased to have visiting public men call on him. So I asked my informant to arrange an interview, which he did.

Senator Harlan had gone from the Senate to the Cabinet, and had the rare good fortune to go from the Cabinet back into the Senate.

So during the conversation I asked him if a man in the prime of life who liked a political career, being in the House or Senate and feeling that he had a good chance of remaining therein, would be wise in exchanging it for an appointive position.

He replied that he had been unusually fortunate in being sent back to the Senate after leaving it for the Cabinet, and his advice to such a man as I described would be not to exchange a seat in House or Senate, provided he held it by what appeared to be a certain tenure, for any appointive position except the Chief Justiceship of the Supreme Court of the United States or for any elective office except the Presidency of the Republic. Most assuredly that was a high estimate to place on the value of a seat in either House of Congress. Whether Senator Harlan ever communicated that idea to Senator ALLISON I do not know; but I do know that Senator ALLISON'S conduct was in harmony with Senator Harlan's idea.

Senator ALLISON was not in the lime light as much as several of his senatorial contemporaries, for there was no element of the spectacular in him, but he accomplished more perhaps in the way of legislation than any of them. Wherefore? Because he was conservative in all things, extreme in nothing; conciliatory, not aggressive; kind and affable in manner; he took things by the smooth handle; he acted on one-half of a famous adage by speaking softly, even if he did not carry a big stick. In the constitution of his mind and by habit he was as much of a compromiser as was Henry Clay, and when we remember that most legislation is by compromise, we can readily understand his success.

To him belonged the blessing vouchsafed to peacemakers in the Sermon on the Mount. His country owes him much, because through his conciliatory tactics many valuable laws were placed upon the statute books. His party owes him more, because, by gentleness and skill, by patience and forbearance, he composed many quarrels and feuds within the political family to which he belonged and which, if not composed, might have rent the party in twain. It is said that his constituents will erect monuments to his memory in both Iowa and the city of Washington. He is well entitled to both. He served them well, and they honor themselves in honoring him. In this beautiful capital of a mighty Nation there are too many statues of soldiers and too few statues of statesmen; for "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war."

Iowa has always been rich in public men. She has ever had and now has one of the strongest delegations in House and Senate. She has given to the service of the Republic many soldiers, jurists, orators, and statesmen. It is no exaggeration, no flattery, to say that of them all Senator WILLIAM BOYD ALLISON achieved the widest and most enduring fame.

[Mr. CANNON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, Senator ALLISON, for more than half a century as a citizen of Iowa, endeared himself to all by his courtesy, his ability, and devotion to the duties of high station. In his death the State lost her most distinguished son and the Nation one of her ablest and most trusted leaders.

My acquaintance with Senator ALLISON practically began when I came to Congress as the result of the election of 1890. I knew him before that as a great Senator, as a public servant in whom the people of the State had absolute confidence, but I have always felt that my real acquaintance with and knowledge of the man began with the relationship which comes to those who are working in harmony in the great legislative body of the Senate and the House.

As a new Member of Congress, I went to him for advice and counsel, and never in vain. Generous, considerate, kind, and wise, he helped every one of his colleagues who needed his assistance. To my mind a misconception, even in his own State, has grown up in regard to his characteristics and the habits of his mind. One of my colleagues earlier in to-day's proceedings referred to the fact that he was called and thought of by certain men as without firmness; in other words, accusing him of being a "trimmer."

After an intimate acquaintance with Senator ALLISON for the last eighteen years, I want to say that that charge against him is absolutely without foundation. He accomplished great results without the blare of trumpets and sounding of drums; he accomplished greater results than would have been possible if he had gone at the business he sought to accomplish by first arousing antagonism. He served his country not only during the time and stress of the civil war in this House, but he served his country in the Senate of the United States when great problems affecting the credit of the Nation were involved, and in place of antagonizing in trying to accomplish what we all now agree upon without regard to party as being right, he sought to avert the danger of impairment of the credit, depreciating the currency, by compromise that avoided an infinitely worse condition of affairs than those brought about through his efforts.

I think the great Senator from Iowa, by his ability to manage and harmonize and bring together conflicting interests, performed service to his Nation that has not been excelled in all the years of its past. Without his guidance the Republic would have gone upon dangerous rocks.

The first time I met Senator ALLISON was during his first canvass for the Senate of the United States. He was defeated in that campaign. Another distinguished Iowan was selected. In the next vacancy he was again a candidate, and successfully, and from that day on during his political life Senator ALLISON never was compelled to attend a session of the legislature in order to secure his reelection. The people of Iowa saw to that. His work in the House had given a broad foundation on which he could build his future political activity. His work in the Senate commended itself to the people of his State so that he stood without a rival in their affections. During all this long leadership his voice was always for harmony among his associates and for justice to all the people.

It is a pathetic figure that I recall to-day of only a year ago when, stricken with disease, he was attending to the duties of his high office and the discharge of the responsibility of his great leadership in the Senate with the idea among some that the people of Iowa were tired of his services. Without complaint and without a moment's hesitation he pursued the even tenor of his way, discharging with great ability all the duties of his commanding place in the Senate. When doubt existed on some lines of legislation—the Congress and the Executive not in full harmony—the great Senator from Iowa pointed the way to harmony and success.

Nothing could induce him to desert his post in the Senate of the United States. Nothing could induce him to say a word of criticism against any member of his party in his State. He toiled on here until the very day of the adjournment, in the early part of June; and I know it is a gratification to every citizen of our great State, without regard to party, without regard to faction, that the people of that great State of the West, by a majority vote, gave him a certificate of confidence that was the greatest comfort to him in the last months of his life.

Mr. Speaker, Senator ALLISON lived for fifty years in the city of Dubuque. Senator ALLISON lived for half a century in the State of Iowa. When he was called to pass to the other side, the people of the State and the people of his city, in the outpouring of mourners at his grave, gave absolute proof that he stood foremost in their affection, not only as a statesman, but as a man.

He had peculiar ability as a statesman; he had most winning qualities as a man; and it seems to me, when you balance up his great life, a life of public service far beyond what is usually given, that you must, when you see the affection for him which was held by the people of Dubuque, many of whom had known him from their infancy to their manhood and womanhood; when you see that great outpouring of people, regardless of party, regardless of faction, all bearing tribute of their love at his last resting place in the cemetery of that city of his choice, overlooking the majestic Mississippi River, near his old friend and associate, Colonel Henderson; when you see this you can say, "Here was a man."

And it does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that in the estimate of his life, in the estimate of what he has done, more time must elapse before a true and just estimate can be made. We are too near to many of the great measures he fought to enact into law; but in the lapse of years the students of history will see that this unpretentious Senator from Iowa, this great Senator from Iowa, this constructive statesman of the United States, will take his place among the great public servants of the Republic, and his name will be revered more and more by all students of our political history as the years go by. That those who come after him may be as conspicuous in ability, as strong in leadership, as true to conviction, is the earnest hope of all citizens of our great State.

Mr. BIRDSALL. Mr. Speaker, Hon. WILLIAM BOYD ALLISON was born on a farm near Perry, Wayne County, Ohio, March 2, 1829, and died at his home in Dubuque, Iowa, August 4, 1908. His childhood days were spent like those of other country boys, in labor upon the farm and in attendance upon the district school. He then attended Allegheny College, at Meadville, Pa., and the Western Reserve College, at Hudson, Ohio. In 1850 he began the study of law at Wooster, Ohio, and the following year was admitted to the Wayne County bar.

The commencement of his political career was as a delegate to the Ohio state convention in 1856, which convention supported Fremont for the Presidency.

In 1857 he came west to Iowa and located at Dubuque, immediately entering upon the practice of his profession, in which he continued actively engaged until elected to Congress. He was an able lawyer, and the published records of the Iowa courts attest the fact that he was engaged as counsel in many important cases. Mr. ALLISON had, however, a natural aptitude for politics, and soon established himself in the confidence not only of the people of his immediate community, but of the State at large. In 1860 he was sent as a delegate to the national Republican convention at Chicago, was one of the secretaries of that convention, and aided in the nomination of Lincoln for the Presidency.

ALLISON was an early friend of Hon. Samuel J. Kirkwood, the war governor of Iowa, and upon the breaking out of the civil war was appointed a member of his staff and rendered valuable service in recruiting and enlisting a regiment in northeastern Iowa for the war. In 1862 he was elected to Congress and served by successive terms until March 4, 1871, declining reelection. He was promptly elected to the Senate of the United States for the term commencing March 4, 1873, and served continuously in that body until his death, on August 4, 1908.

In June, 1908, he received the indorsement of the Republican party of Iowa for reelection as his own successor for the term commencing March 4, 1909.

His term of service in the Congress of the United States is exceeded by that of but one other man in the history of our Nation, and his term of continuous service in the Senate exceeds that of any other man who ever served in that great body.

What a period in American history, my colleagues, is covered by his service here and in the Senate. With what events and what names his career is indissolubly connected, and how intimately he was associated with them. When he entered this House the clash of arms resounded throughout the Nation; brother was battling with brother in internecine conflict; the Constitution was being sorely tried by the convulsions of a Nation engaged in purifying itself. He saw that Nation redeemed, the Constitution sustained and made supreme in the land. He lived to see the clouds of error pass away, the mists of prejudice and passion dissipated. He lived to see a government of the people, this monument to liberty and human freedom, wrought out through so much blood and treasure, builded upon a safe and secure foundation among the nations of the earth.

He helped to adorn the entablatures of that monument with the best fruits of peace and national progress, and to transmit it to posterity unstained and undimmed, carved with an imperishable record of valor and achievement.

In this House he was the colleague of Blaine, Stevens, and Garfield. In the Senate, of Bayard of Delaware, Logan of Illinois, Morton of Indiana, Ingalls of Kansas, Hamlin of Maine, Conkling of New York, Sherman and Thurman of Ohio, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Edmunds and Morrill of Vermont, Howe of Wisconsin, and other great men whose names adorn our history for the past thirty-five years.

Thrice offered Cabinet positions, he thrice refused, preferring to remain in the Senate and in the service of that great State whose people had learned his worth and loved and honored him.

He was the trusted counselor of Presidents and Cabinets from Lincoln to Roosevelt. No narrow system sunk him to the vulgar level of the politician. No domestic difficulties, no domestic weakness, surrounded him; but, aloof from the sordid occurrences of life, his sole ambition was the welfare of his country, and to this end he gave a lifetime of unremitting toil. He was a master of tact, and succeeded in subduing conflicts in the Senate when genius and talent failed.

He was for peace, but never at the sacrifice of principle. A leader in his party, seeking no self-advancement, his counsels were respected and his advice usually followed. He was the peaceful Warwick of American politics.

The handiwork and brain work of Senator ALLISON, found running through the statutes of the past forty-five years, attest his industry and capacity as a statesman and legislator. Our laws are but a reflex of the policy and manners of the age in which we live, and furnish the only reliable index to posterity of our achievements. The Tables of the Hebrew law, the Institutes of Menu, the Code of Justinian and that of Napoleon alike, furnish but a reflection of the genius, habits, civilization, and morals of a people. So the past forty-five years of American progress, the habits and morals of our people, will be reflected in the statutes of its lawmakers.

He was a moderate in legislation, but neither a laggard nor obstructionist. He loved the Constitution and believed it the ark of our safety, but welcomed reforms along any lines that could be safely pursued within the limits of our fundamental law. He welcomed progress, but also held fast to that which had been found sound and safe in governmental action and had little patience for those who wanted to see if the machine would run when broken.

Mr. Speaker, as a Nation we are set upon a hill in sight of all the other nations of the earth. We are working out here an experiment in self-government upon a scale never before attempted anywhere on earth. Ninety millions of people now—200,000,000 at the close of the present century—scattered over an area as large as all Europe, with a climate and with interests as diversified as are those of England and Russia, Norway and Spain; it is for our posterity to determine whether this vast population will hold together under the forms of a republic or whether centralization will get the better through actual or disguised monarchy; whether shifting corruption is better than permanent bureaucracy; and as our great cities increase in population the specter of want and the gaunt figure of famine will stalk through the land and socialism and communism claim to be heard. Truly, America has a great future before her—great in care, great in toil, great in responsibility, great in true glory if she be guided in wisdom and righteousness; great in shame if she fall.

Well for us and our posterity if men of the ALLISON mold shall shape our destiny as a Nation and are on guard to pilot the "ship of state."

Senator ALLISON was a gentleman of the old school, a philosopher of the new school, with the manners of Chesterfield and the learning of Parr, and combined with it all the gentleness and modesty of a woman. He was a worker.

He honored toil and dignified labor because he knew that within its warp and woof was contained the destiny of mankind. He had received the poor man's heritage, "Strong hands and a still hardier spirit."

Reared upon a farm, it was there amid the fragrance of the clover blossom and the perfume of a thousand flowers, where reflection went hand in hand with honest toil, that were laid those habits of industry that became the chief characteristic of his after life. By the light of the faggot he commenced in early life to store his mind with useful knowledge and in all his years kept garnering to that fund until his mind became a vast storehouse of information useful to his fellow-men.

The faculty of his mind for detail seemed infinite, and I believe it can truthfully be said that no other man in the public life of the Nation, either past or present, possessed so much knowledge of the intricate details of government. An event, a fact, a figure once impressed upon his memory seemed to be indelible and always capable of recall at his command, enabling him, though not an eloquent man, to express gigantic sentiments of instructive wisdom.

Mr. Speaker, the ancients deified their great men by dividing the stars into constellations named for them, that their memories might ever be before them; later pyramids and obelisks were built for the same purpose. Now monuments and commemorative tablets are erected to perpetuate the memory of the dead; but the greatest monument to any man is that builded by his own hands and engraven on the hearts of the people.

Three generations of men in the State of Iowa have known and loved Senator ALLISON, and his name and memory are engraven on the hearts of our people.

On the day when his remains were taken to their final resting place his home city was in mourning; business suits were hung in the closet; not a wheel in a factory stirred; not an office or place of business opened its doors. Thousands of people lined the way from his home to the cemetery, and with bowed heads attested their regard for a neighbor and respect to his ashes, while throughout our entire State a great and grateful people, their pulses beating in mournful unsion, paid reverential homage to our illustrious dead.

The record of his life will furnish an inspiration to youth, a lesson to age. A public life unsullied, a private life stainless as the stars, for he can say unto his heavenly friend, "I have kept unfringed my nature's law; the only written chart thou gavest me to guide me I have steered by to the end."

Amid the vicissitudes, allurements, and temptations of public life he demonstrated "that even in a palace life may be led well."

He died in the fullness of his years, ripe for the sickle, and ready for the Reaper. The world is better for his having lived; heaven will be richer for his having died.

With what further forms shall the great law of change and progress clothe its workings, gently so have good men taught into the new, the eternal flow of things, like a peaceful river of the fields of heaven shall journey onward in perpetual peace.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, time will not now permit me to say all that I would like to say of the life, the services, and character of this great, grand, and noble man; but Senator ALLISON'S public and private life, as well as the character and magnitude of his public work, have been so eloquently and well described by his friends, both in the Senate and House, that I will not particularize as to his eight years of service in the House and thirty-five years in the Senate, but will confine myself to a brief, but sincere and loving tribute to his memory; not as a formal duty, but as a heartfelt tribute of affection—to speak of him as I knew him; to speak the truth as he would have one speak of him. Knowing him intimately, and admiring him as I did, and having studied his grand life and character, I know that if he could have a voice as to the character of this day's exercises, with his sense of propriety, his high regard for truth, honor, modesty, dignity, and integrity, he would not countenance false praise or desire that he be pictured in other than true colors.

With a life so bright, a character so pure, so many grand and noble qualities manifest in every walk of his life, both private and public, we have sufficient material to draw from to paint the most beautiful picture of a true man imaginable. I got to know him well, and the better I knew him the more I adored him—the more I loved and felt for him.

I first met Senator ALLISON about thirty years ago. He had the usual experience of men in politics, and especially of men who do great things well. He was then misrepresented, maligned, and made the target for criticism, abuse, slander, and libel invented by malicious enemies; but his onward and upward march was not to be impeded; he could not be despaired, nor could his usefulness be destroyed. Violent and unjust criticism was entirely ignored and disregarded; he steadily worked along the lines of duty as he saw it; misconception and misrepresentation of his purposes vanished; year by year he became stronger; the whole country came to understand that he was a great man and worthy of the most implicit confidence. Notwithstanding the fact that he was thus maligned, misrepresented, and misunderstood, his noble character, his patriotic and faithful services endeared him to his countrymen and gave him a most prominent place of honor, not only in our country's history, but in the hearts of the American people as a statesman, a citizen of the highest type of character, and as a pure, grand man. He was held in most exceptional esteem and admiration by not only the people of his own great State, but his popularity went far beyond the borders of his own State and country to remote parts of the world.

Twelve years ago, when a member of our state legislature, when Senator ALLISON came up for reelection to the United States Senate, and was also prominently mentioned for President of the United States, I first became intimately acquainted with him. He was then at the zenith of his power, both mentally and physically.

Like most great men, Senator ALLISON was plain, simple, unassuming, unpretentious, and unselfish. "Simplicity belongs to greatness."

He was a thorough, kind, and obliging gentleman, of ability, purity, integrity, and the highest type of character; always genial, kind, cheery, generous, patient, considerate, and helpful to others. He always had a kind word for all, and was always ready to lend a helping hand, not for selfish purposes, but that he might the better serve them; not aggressive or sentimental in his methods, but always calm, patient, and industrious, with a clear, broad mind, good judgment, and keen vision, ever seeking to secure the best practical results. His natural talent, his good common sense; yes, his uncommon good common sense and intelligent honesty, so correctly described and beautifully pictured by the Speaker; his large store of knowledge of the needs and resources of this Government, acquired during his long term of service in the Senate, prepared by eight years in the House of Representatives; his good judgment; his never questioning integrity; his unswerving fidelity to public interests; his unfaultering faith and rectitude of purpose, dominated by the noblest and loftiest ideals; his firm determination to do justice and right; and, above all things, his abiding devotion to truthfulness, always shunning deceit, conceit, and cunning practices, made him an unusually popular and valuable servant to his country.

He was blessed with extraordinary intelligence, endurance, and foresight; a wonderful intuition and powers of comprehension; a most pleasing personality and an agreeable voice. Senator ALLISON, with so many grand virtues assembled, coupled with his never resisting charm of personality, became an acknowledged authority and an accepted leader. With his ripened experience, naturally the Senate and country looked to him for guidance and as an adviser and leader. As stated by one of his colleagues, "He was to the Senate that of a trusted pilot to a ship." He was for years one of the foremost Americans and statesmen, and his work and achievements left an indelible impression upon his countrymen, and history will give him a place in the front rank of the statesmen and citizens of his time.

As a statesman, Mr. ALLISON, in many respects, had no superior. His great work was largely in the Committees on Appropriations and Finance, but his work and influence were not confined to measures coming before those two great committees. He gave every question of importance careful and thoughtful consideration, which gave him a most comprehensive knowledge of national and international affairs and a thorough understanding of every important question that arose, and he always had at his command the detail and history of all important matters which led up to the issue. He was resourceful, ever ready to yield to better reason when it was made manifest; a man with a clear and practical mind, a remarkable degree of genius and common sense, honest in thought and purpose, honest with the world, honest with himself, true to his neighbors and friends, a most attractive personality, with warm and glorious impulses, and most delightful in his companionship, all of which drew his friends close to him.

Though an acknowledged leader—a place and power achieved not by accident, but by his genius and deeds well done, the virtue of honor, truth, labor, and devotion to duty—he never sought distinction by advertising himself or by pushing himself ahead. Apparently he was unconscious of his power, standing, and position. He was not one of those who passed himself to the front in active debate; his unusually good common sense and his knowledge of human nature and men enabled him to determine when and how to move, and it was generally in the final stages of the settlement of complex and difficult questions that his master art in construction and conciliation was applied with skill and effect, and that in the end his words and suggestions determined the fate of the question.

While he possessed to a full degree the power of great initiative, and was essentially a creator, not a destroyer, yet his master art was conciliation. He sought no compromise with wrong. What was right was right; what was wrong was wrong. He occupied no middle ground when the question of right and wrong was involved. He was a total stranger to the art of demagogy and duplicity. He was not an orator. His life work was not that of framing beautiful sentences, yet he was a speaker of uncommon power. His fancy was not rhetoric or to become an orator; he cared little for eloquence. He was a student; his aim was to get at facts, to fully understand and solve conscientiously and in a practical manner all questions with which he had to deal. He was one of the clearest, cleanest, and soundest minded of men, and with his ripened knowledge little attention was given to his speeches in advance, but they were shaped and fashioned as he delivered them. With his thorough knowledge of all questions, without previous preparation, he would at times speak for hours with great energy and fluency, mastering the subjects discussed with plain but forceful and orderly arranged language; and his able and logical presentation of facts and lucidity of utterances always received sympathetic attention, and his speeches proved most effective.

He was a good politician as well as a great statesman; he had a good memory for names and incidents. Prominent and influential as he was, naturally his advice and counsel was sought in determining political policies as well as in shaping legislation of national and international importance. His advice, counsel, and help were not desired by politicians and statesmen alone, but many people in all walks of life were benefited by it. As Carrie Harrison, an intimate friend of his, writes me:

> Many and many a time at his home his reception hall was crowded with people. Women in tears beseeched his advice and help as they would that of a father or priest, and he considered their petitions as a father would those of his own children.

And as has been referred to here to-day, he was to the Iowa delegation like a father. He filled a great place among the greatest men of his time. His death seemed a most unusual public loss. From Senator ALLISON'S life and character there are many lessons we may learn. Among the choicest memories, those that I will forever cherish, are his confidence and uninterrupted friendship, his noble life and character, and his deeds well done.

That he was respected, loved, and mourned by all classes in his country; that his honesty, character, patriotism, loyalty, and greatness were recognized, was fully demonstrated at his funeral at Dubuque, Iowa; and evidences of the regard and warm friendship entertained by his countrymen were made manifest by the multitude of people at his bier, coming not only from friends and neighbors in his home city and State, but from the remote parts of the whole country, there to pay their last sad tribute of love and to express a deep sense of bereavement.

Mr. CONNER. Mr. Speaker, the death of a prominent citizen inevitably results in bringing his life before the bar of public opinion for criticism and judgment. This is especially true as to one who for many years has been a conspicuous actor in the affairs of his country.

The estimate which the people form of a public man while living is less reliable than after his death. During his life his enemies are apt to minimize his virtues and his friends to magnify them; but after his death the world calmly and dispassionately weighs both the good and evil in his life and judges him fairly and impartially.

Fortunate, indeed, is the man who, after a long public career, when overtaken by death, has it universally said of him that his life made the world richer, and his death made it poorer.

Senator ALLISON was a distinguished citizen of the Republic, and while in a sense he belonged to the State of Iowa, because his home was there and from there he bore his commission, yet in a broader sense he belonged to the Nation.

For almost half a century prior to his death he was a national character, giving his time and services for the benefit of the whole country. While the State of Iowa is proud to claim him as her son, she recognizes the merit of the claim that he belonged to the Nation at large.

Iowa has produced many distinguished men and is proud of their achievements, but comparing them with Senator ALLISON, it is safe to assert that from the standpoint of statesmanship and legislative ability, not one of them was his equal, and it is doubtful if the Nation during his time produced his superior.

Senator ALLISON'S usefulness to his country and his capacity to serve it have not up to this date been fully appreciated. Time, however, will bring his splendid qualities as a statesman and lawmaker to be fully recognized.

The elements in him which contributed to his success were those which are generally found in great characters. He was possessed of a strong mentality, which enabled him to readily grasp and solve the great problems which from time to time have presented themselves during the last fifty years.

He was honest from principle and habit, and not as a matter of policy. No one ever came in contact with him without being impressed with his good faith and sincerity. His habits of industry were known to everyone familiar with his life. Not one of his colleagues in Congress kept in closer touch with the details of legislation, and no one more assiduously perused the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the purpose of keeping posted on pending legislation.

It was because of these facts that his colleagues leaned upon him and trusted him to guide them in important matters of legislation. It was not an infrequent occurrence, when complicated matters were pending in the Senate, for Senator ALLISON, by a timely suggestion, to solve the difficulties which confronted that body and to bring about legislation of a wholesome character.

He was universally courteous in his demeanor, always respectful in his treatment of those with whom he came in contact. The genial smile which lighted up his face when in conversation won for him the lasting friendship of those who met him.

It is a great compliment to the State of Iowa to have it said that the uninterrupted service of Senator ALLISON in the Senate of the United States was longer than that of any other man, and a still greater compliment to have it said that his services were of greater value to his country than those of any other man.

His life should be an example for the young men of the country, and we will all do well to emulate the virtues of this wise and illustrious statesman.

Mr. HUBBARD of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, we have just commemorated the birthday of Lincoln. To-morrow we recall with gratitude the name of Washington. The very greatness of these heroes has removed them, in a measure, from the common air, and they are become revered and symbolic names, typifying the making and saving of the Union.

We, friends, are assembled here to fondly recall the face and memory of a great man, once our friend, so newly gone that his touch and smile are still familiar, his voice still lingers. I can not analyze with weight and balance the elements that made Senator ALLISON great. He himself, I have been told, looked back half humorously, half in wonder, at the career which had lifted the obscure country lawyer, starting without wealth, friends or favor, to the leadership of the Senate, to an untitled premiership in nearly every administration for forty years. To a friend he spoke of this with modest pride and patriotic wisdom. To him his life was but another proof of the creative power of free institutions, taking our native clay and from it making and shaping men as men are needed. He said that the glory and safety of the Republic is that it is not governed by great men, but by common men, whom it raises to the heights of sacrifice, wisdom, and power, as the exigency requires.

My mind refuses to dwell upon his greatness. I mark him not in this hour, when I need but close my eyes to see his grave, by the laws he made, by his long years of distinguished public service. But tears are near and lips tremble when I see the indwelling spirit of the man. How gentle and patient that kindly wisdom, which made you your own adviser, you scarcely knew how. How friendly and unobtrusive the counsel—felt rather than heard. His very presence ended strife and appeased contention.

I can see him now as he greeted your coming with outstretched hand, with welcoming smile, with never-failing, heartfelt courtesy. His hand shall clasp our hand never again, his smile never more shall light our way; his memory shall dwell with us enduringly.

He is at rest. He dwells in peace. Peace, perfect peace, be his.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, it was my good fortune to be associated with Senator WILLIAM BOYD ALLISON in close, confidential relations for a period of six years. That association gave me an unusual opportunity to observe his life and character and to measure the importance of his service to the people and to the Nation. And if what I have to say of this distinguished statesman shall exceed in length the tributes usually paid on occasions of this kind, I ask the indulgence and the pardon of the House, because my words are prompted by a sincere appreciation of his high and unselfish public service and a deep and abiding affection for the man.

His record as a statesman and public servant will probably never be surpassed. It was a service not simply remarkable because of its length, but even more remarkable because of its importance. He entered this House as a Member when the Union was shattered by secession and the Nation in the throes of civil war; and an appreciative constituency kept him here for four terms and then promoted him to the Senate, where he served for a longer period than any man in the history of the Republic. Six successive times did the legislature of our State choose him for this high station, and only a few weeks before his death the grateful people of Iowa, by a decisive majority in a direct primary, renewed his commission for six years more.

To review the public career of Senator ALLISON would be to write the history of the Republican party from its birth to the present time; it would mean a review of practically all the important legislation enacted by Congress during the past forty-five years. The history of those years is without a parallel in the annals of time; it is the brightest half century which any nation has enjoyed since the dawn of civilization. The milestones which mark the progress of the Republic during that period are the great policies for which that party has stood: Free soil, free men, the Union, the payment of the debt, honest money, protection to American industry, internal development, the gold standard, the maintenance of law, and government regulation of great corporations. Under the operation of these policies we have become the most rich and powerful Nation on earth, and our development is the marvel of the civilized world.

Senator ALLISON not only had an important part in shaping these great policies, but no man in the Senate had a larger hand in that more difficult and exacting task of embodying them into the statute law of the land.

One writer expressed it tersely when he said that—

> He has not made as much noise as Alexander, or as much trouble as Julius Cæsar, but he has written into the statute books of his country more useful legislation than any legislator who has ever lived in this country or in any other government.

His first conspicuous service to the Nation, after assisting in the nomination of Abraham Lincoln for President in 1860, was in starting the movement to permit soldiers in the field to vote at the election in 1862. He induced Governor Kirkwood to call a special session of the Iowa legislature, which passed an act permitting soldiers at the front to vote. The action of Iowa was immediately followed by other Northern States, thus insuring a Congress in harmony with Lincoln's administration.

He bore a more influential part than any other man in all the financial legislation from the establishment of the national banking system in 1864, onward to the resumption act of 1875, the coinage act of 1878, down to the gold-standard act of 1900, and yet, because of his unwillingness in life to claim the credit which was rightfully his due, his name is popularly linked with only one of these great fiscal measures—the Bland-Allison Act of 1878.

We are all more or less familiar with that act, but few appreciate the far-reaching importance and the momentous consequences to our currency system which resulted from that portion of it drafted by Senator ALLISON. The Bland bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, provided for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, and in this form went over to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Finance, which then consisted of nine members—four free-silver men, four gold-standard men, and WILLIAM B. ALLISON. A flat vote on one side meant free silver, with the result of making silver the single and sole standard of value; on the other side, a deadlock between the two Houses of Congress, with continued agitation and uncertainty on this vital subject at a time when the country was greatly disturbed over the question. In this crisis in the monetary affairs Senator ALLISON came forward with two amendments which obviated both of these difficulties, saved the country from the catastrophe of unrestricted silver coinage, and laid the foundation for the absolute acceptance of the gold standard.

In brief, these amendments provided for the limited coinage of silver by the Government and a conference of the nations of the world looking to international bimetallism. Subsequent events amply proved the wisdom of these amendments. After they had been adopted by Congress, both political parties accepted the proposition for an international conference and incorporated it in their platforms down to 1896, when the supreme test on the silver question was made.

In plain, understandable English the result of these two amendments was, first, the plan for limited coinage on government account, which strengthened the basic principle of the gold standard and pushed to the rear the demand for free and unlimited coinage of silver; and, second, the proposal for an international agreement removed the money question from partisan politics until such time as the logic of events had made the gold standard impregnable.

I need not review the fierce political battles that raged in two presidential campaigns over the money question. It is enough to say that when the lamented President McKinley, on March 14, 1900, affixed his signature to the gold-standard act and made it a law he wrote "finis" to the liveliest and most exciting chapter in the monetary history of the United States. Senator ALLISON had a large part in writing that law, and its successful operation up to this time is known to all.

Less familiarity exists, however, with one feature of that law, a provision which marks a new epoch in the history of governmental financiering. The refunding provision of that law, which was drafted by Senator ALLISON, not only uplifted the standard of our national credit, but actually saved to the Government the enormous sum of sixteen and a half million dollars. The Allison refunding plan has demonstrated the ability of this Government to float a 2 per cent bond at par and to reduce the interest rate on more than one-half of its bonded indebtedness from 3, 4, and 5 per cent to 2 per cent.

When the Allison refunding amendment to the gold-standard act was presented it was characterized by not a few prominent Members of Congress as "rainbow chasing," and the skepticism extended even to the then Secretary of the Treasury. It was attempting the unattainable, they said, to ask holders of government bonds to surrender 4 and 5 per cent interest and accept 2 instead; and was not at that moment England's choicest 2½ per cent bonds and Germany's imperial 3 per cents selling below par? Some even characterized the proposition as visionary, but its author persevered, and the amendment became a part of the law.

In theory the plan seemed to be unworkable; in practice it demonstrated that American credit is the highest in the world. Under that amendment $646,250,150 of the public debt was refunded into 2 per cent bonds at a net profit to the Government of $16,551,037.54. Up to this time more than one-half of the public debt has been converted from an average of 4 per cent interest to 2 per cent, and if you will examine the bond quotations in the daily papers, you will note that these 2 per cent bonds were quoted yesterday above par.

This tremendous fiscal operation has gone on without the slightest jar to the money market and practically unbeknown to the public generally.

These examples of his conspicuous service to his country in financial legislation are only two of a large number of similar instances, both great and small, which might be cited to show how and why he attained his distinction as one of the greatest economists and financiers in the world. That he was so regarded is evidenced by the distinguished service he rendered as chairman of the International Monetary Conference of 1892 at Brussels and by the invitations extended to him by Presidents Garfield and Harrison to enter their respective Cabinets as Secretary of the Treasury.

But equally distinguished and valuable was his service to the Republic in connection with the revenue and tariff laws, a service which by unanimous consent won for him the title of the "Greatest tariff expert in the Nation." He possessed the broadest, deepest, and most comprehensive knowledge of tariff and governmental finance of any statesman of his time.

There is no class of legislation more intricate than that relating to the tariff. The first consideration must be the broad, general effect on the economic situation. To determine this requires the most careful consideration of the effects to be produced on the various industries involved, and no general tariff revision is made without affecting more or less directly every industry in the country. Questions of prices to consumers as well as to producers, the upbuilding of commerce and industry, the raising of revenue, the effect on foreign and home markets, the relations of treaty obligations, and countless other considerations great and small present themselves in bewildering confusion.

With the preparation of every one of the hundreds of paragraphs in each of the dozen or more schedules of a tariff bill comes pressure from those directly affected. From absinthe, aconite, and acorns down to zaffer, Zante currants, and zinc there are approximately 5,000 articles included in a tariff bill, and every man who buys or sells, imports or exports, produces or consumes any of them has an inalienable right to be heard, and most of them are not backward in coming forward to assert it.

Thirty-eight years' service on committees which formulate and perfect tariff bills made this ordeal oft-recurring to Senator ALLISON. Patient, thoughtful, and thorough attention to the endless details of frequent complete tariff revisions, to say nothing of partial revisions and attempts at revision which failed, followed by the prodigal-expenditure of adroitness and skill in piloting the bills through the tortuous channels of legislation, and the nerve-racking task of finally adjusting in conference the complex differences between the two Houses—this is the price he paid for this title which the public bestowed upon him.

In 1865 he was assigned to the Committee on Ways and Means by Speaker Colfax—an unusual honor for a Member in his second term. He continued as a member of that committee during the remainder of his service in this body, and served on the Finance Committee in the Senate from 1877 up to the time of his death. He has played an important part in the preparation and passage of every tariff bill for the past forty-five years.

A careful search of the records will disclose the fact that much of the tariff legislation written into our statute books during the last half century was actually penned by the hand of Senator ALLISON. As an example of his constructive ability in this direction, I might call attention to the fact that he wrote the tin-plate schedule which was first embodied into law in the McKinley tariff act of 1890—a schedule around which raged more fierce political discussion than any in recent times. This schedule was denounced and defended from one end of the country to the other, and there are many people who believe that the heated denunciation of this particular paragraph of the McKinley bill, which made it a national issue, followed as it was by the building up in our country of a great industry, was one of the most important factors in elevating the beloved and now lamented McKinley to the Presidency of the United States.

Be that as it may, it is a matter of record that Senator ALLISON was the author of this particular schedule. It will be recalled that the Democrats had control of the House in the Fiftieth Congress, and under the leadership of Hon. Roger Q. Mills, of Texas, this House passed what is known as the Mills bill (H. R. 9051)—a complete revision of the tariff. The bill went to the Senate and was referred to the Finance Committee. The Republicans had control of the Senate in that Congress, and when this bill was reported to the Senate, July 21, 1888, by Senator ALLISON, the House bill was all stricken out, and in its place was a revision of the tariff based on the principle of protection. An entirely new bill had been drafted by the Finance Committee, and in that bill appeared the first attempt to put a duty on tin plate. In the steel schedule of that bill is the following paragraph:

147. Sheets or plates of iron and steel, or taggers iron or steel, coated with tin or lead, or with a mixture of which these metals, or either of them, is a component part, by the dipping or any other process, and commercially known as tin plates, terne plates, and taggers tin, 1 cent per pound.

The Mills bill and the Senate substitute failed of enactment, the two Houses being unable to agree.

In the succeeding Congress (the Fifty-first) the Republicans had a majority in both the House and Senate, and the McKinley bill became a law October 1, 1890. That bill, as reported to the House and finally passed, contained the tin-plate paragraph above quoted verbatim et literatim.

It is no reflection upon the Committee on Ways and Means or upon its distinguished chairman that they incorporated into their bill this paragraph and many others which had been carefully worked out by the Senate committee in the previous Congress—they simply accepted the judgment of the other branch of Congress, formally expressed two years before.

While Senator ALLISON had a large and important part in writing the laws which produced the revenues, he had an equally important part in controlling the expenditures of the Government. From the time of his entry into the Senate in 1873 to the date of his death he was a member of the Committee on Appropriations and for nearly twenty-five years its chairman. During his incumbency as chairman he bore the tremendous responsibility of scrutinizing the appropriation of nearly $15,000,000,000.

Chairmanship of the Committee on Appropriations means constant toil and labor and the performance of more legislative drudgery than falls to the lot of any other committee. Senator ALLISON's sagacity and painstaking endeavors in this influential position undoubtedly saved his country millions of dollars. Not a penny of private gain ever came to him by his public service. He lived and died a poor man.

The highest tribute which can be paid to a man's service in Congress is the estimate of those with whom he associates, and in all the history of the Senate no man has ever attained greater influence or higher respect and confidence of all his associates, without regard to party, than did Senator ALLISON.

For several years prior to his death he was unanimously selected as chairman of the Republican caucus and also chairman of the committee on the order of business, commonly called the "steering committee." In addition, he was empowered by the caucus to designate the other members of the steering committee and to name the committee on committees. The functions of these two committees, in executing the will of the majority party, is of the most far-reaching importance and consequences.

As is well known, the committee on committees has control of the assignment of Senators to committee places; in short, determines the personnel of the standing committees of the Senate. As to the steering committee, no reference to it is found in any of the government publications, and yet it is one of the most potential factors in the whole congressional legislative machine. It is the safety valve, the governor, and the brakes on the wheels, all in one. On broad lines, it determines what legislation shall be pressed for passage and what shall slumber in pigeonholes. It is a shaper of party policy—the watchdog of legislative enactment.

In intrusting the selection of these two committees to Senator ALLISON, more power over legislation could not well be conferred upon one man under a republican form of government. Certainly the United States Senate, regarded by some as the greatest legislative body in the world, could not bestow a greater badge of honor and confidence upon anyone.

And with what consummate wisdom and fairness did Senator ALLISON make up these powerful committees. I recall his method of choosing the steering committee of 10 members. With approximately 60 Republican Senators, they were divided geographically into groups of 6, beginning with New England and going through to the Pacific coast. From each of these groups of 6 Senators he selected 1 member of the steering committee, thus giving to every section of the country a representative upon this governing committee.

It was this unfailing spirit of fairness, coupled with wisdom and unerring judgment, which enabled him to do great things. The guiding star of his life was that brief sentence of Bacon's: "Knowledge is power."

Upon every important subject of legislation as it came up he worked with unflagging zeal to store his well-ordered mind with all the information available, and he never stopped until he had completely mastered the subject in detail. A close observer, a careful student, a clear thinker, and eminently practical, he proved all things and held fast to that which is good. As a consequence, those who were less informed, having implicit confidence in his judgment, were content to follow his lead, and I have never heard of anyone going wrong by so doing.

For many years he sat at the head of the table of the leaders of the Senate—the beloved and undisputed arbiter of that body. When important measures of legislation were threatened with defeat because of the pronounced differences of men, when complex legislative situations arose, Congress instinctively turned to Senator ALLISON to smooth over the rough places and point the way out of the difficulty. He possessed that rare faculty of harmonizing the apparently irreconcilable views of radical and obstinate men; his wise counsel saved many a worthy measure from failure. He was enabled to do this by his solid qualities of character, his well-poised mind, his clear perception, his patience, integrity, honesty, and single-minded devotion to the interests of the people.

Others might wrangle, but he never lost his temper. Others might impugn the motives of men, but he was ever mindful of the rights of his fellows. He occupied a place above the strife and contention of factions; he was the embodiment of prudence, patriotism; always calm, serene, optimistic.

With the quiet dignity of unconscious power he modestly performed his tasks—doing great things, but doing them quietly. To him the modern idea of glory measured by newspaper headlines was distasteful, almost repugnant. So content was he with the mere satisfaction of duty faithfully performed that he would not even allow his friends to claim for him the credit which was rightfully his.

It was in the committee room, where the real work of Congress is done, that his greatest impress on legislation was made. I dare say that within the four walls of the inner room of the Senate Committee on Appropriations more important legislation has been put into final form and more crises in the affairs of the Republic have been wisely met and solved than in any other spot in this capital. And in it all the wise conservatism and keen foresight of Iowa's most distinguished statesman have been determining factors.

While performing these larger tasks for the Nation, he was never unmindful of the interests of his State and her individual citizens. No man in all the history of Iowa has been so helpful to as many people, and an appeal from the humblest citizen met the same hearty and considerate attention as did the greater affairs of his life. If the little things which he did for others could all be brought together, it would form the greatest monument which can be erected to the conscientious devotion and zeal of this faithful public servant.

But Senator ALLISON is loved not only for what he did, but for what he was. He had a most attractive personality. Amiable in disposition, cordial in his bearing, his unfailing courtesy, quiet temperament, and charm of manner won for him the lasting esteem and admiration of all with whom he came in contact. His private life was as free from blemish as his public life was from the breath of scandal. A prodigious worker, he found relaxation and recreation in the quiet of his library here in Washington or at his home in Dubuque, with the companionship of his friends and his books and papers.

When George Washington died it was said of him that Providence left him childless in order that he might be in a closer sense the Father of his Country. Senator ALLISON, when bereft of his chosen companion, gave his whole life to the service of his country and his country alone. His highest ambition was the happiness and welfare of the people.

His memory will always be cherished not only for his greatness but for his goodness. Long association demonstrated to me that the strongest personal trait of this great man was his kindliness of heart and the consideration he invariably showed toward others. I never heard him utter an unkind word of a fellow-man, and he never harbored resentment toward another, no matter how great the provocation,

Possessed of a nature at once amiable and unselfish, he won his way into the affections of the people by his sincerity and strength, his generosity and kindliness. He was a living exemplification of the Golden Rule, and his lovable character and noble spirit has enshrined him for all time in the hearts of the people of his State and country.

Mr. HAMILTON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, not having been personally acquainted with Senator ALLISON and only serving one session in this House while he served his last term in the Senate, I can not speak of him personally, but only as one of his constituents who for years held him in high regard, though differing politically. Senator ALLISON's name in his home State was known by every man, woman, and child. It was known to be revered, whether they agreed with him politically or otherwise. He was looked upon as being conscientious in whatever work he undertook to accomplish. And it seems to me the life and success of every man in this world is measured by what they accomplish and not by what they profess. Senator ALLISON made no vaunting profession, but steadily worked at his task until he had accomplished as nearly as possible the purpose in view. He was not one of those statesmen that we hear spoken of as a man who keeps his ear to the ground, but he was of that class of statesmen upon whom, after the man who keeps his ear to the ground and has perhaps mistaken the current there received and stirred by agitation the minds of the populace and caused all sorts of turmoil and disturbance, it rested to pour oil on the troubled waters and to bring out of this chaotic condition the legislation necessary for the progress and prosperity of his country.

This was the sphere he occupied as a statesman. Not an agitator, but one who steadily ground out those things which are absolutely necessary for the general welfare of the whole country. Not only did he occupy this position as a statesman in the halls of legislation, but my friends upon the floor of the House well know that he occupied a like position in one of the great political parties of this country with whom he had cast his lot—that political party which, whether we admit wisely or unwisely, has brought forth practically all the legislation for the last forty years, that has controlled the affairs of this country. In that political party he was also a peacemaker, and in their partisan difficulties, in their political strifes, it was he, not only in the State of Iowa, but in the Nation, that many times the leaders of his party went to in order that they might smooth over the difficulties that had arisen.

He always had a keen appreciation of the many diversified interests of the country—realizing that in order to carry out that principle, "the greatest good to the greatest number," it was necessary to concede many points in order to harmonize all. Like many others, he at one time possessed the ambition to be President of the United States. He, however, did not allow his personal ambition to overcome his never wavering devotion to his party or his country. Personal ambition with him was secondary to public service.

Therefore I say upon this occasion that he was one of that class of men that the country most needs—a man who, as has been stated here to-day, is capable of taking hold of the loose ends that have been unraveled by the strife of others, and by his power of compromise, his power almost of convincing a man against his will; by that power which he possessed he has done more, in my judgment, toward the legislation that has been placed upon the statute books of this country in the last forty years than any other one man in this Nation; and, as I suggested a moment ago, while not personally acquainted with Senator ALLISON, when I attended his funeral and saw the thousands of his neighbors and friends who lined the streets as his remains were taken to their last resting place, I could not help realizing that he was a man of a kind heart and of a loving disposition, else not this demonstration.

I will say in conclusion that he has left us a statesmanship to be emulated, but one difficult to surpass.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I heard Senator Harlan relate how WILLIAM BOYD ALLISON came to enter congressional life. He had taken quite an active interest in public affairs in Iowa and had rendered valuable service to Governor Kirkwood in raising troops to be sent to the front during the war. Early in the sixties he was a candidate for district attorney for the district of Iowa, and having received the indorsement of the two Senators from Iowa, he came to Washington to look after the matter of his appointment, and while there was a guest of Senator Harlan. For some reason the senior Senator found it necessary to withdraw his indorsement, and of course he failed to receive the appointment. Mrs. Harlan, realizing how keenly he felt the disappointment, suggested that he return to Iowa and secure the nomination for Congress. He acted on the suggestion and returned as a Member of the next House, thus starting a congressional career which, in length of service, has not been exceeded in the annals of American statesmanship and, in the point of accomplishment, not excelled in the past half century.

It was not my good fortune to have had a personal acquaintance with Senator ALLISON until I came to Washington as a Member of the Sixtieth Congress. I remember, however, the first visit I had with the Senator, when I called at his apartments on his invitation. In talking over the matter of what I expected in the way of committee assignments, he suggested that I ask for an assignment to a committee where the work would be congenial, stating that it was not within the compass of the human mind to fully master all the subjects of legislation; that this was an age of specialists, and a Member could serve his country best by striving to thoroughly familiarize himself with some particular line of work. I thought at that time how much Senator ALLISON had accomplished by following that course during his life in Congress.

Early in his career he secured membership on the two great Committees of Appropriations and Finance and became an authority on matters pertaining to the work of those committees.

Senator ALLISON had a natural aptitude for legislation. His industry, tact, patience, and consideration for the views of others were valuable assets when it came to harmonizing differences of opinion on some important matter of legislation. It has been said of Senator ALLISON that he put the finishing touches on more legislation than any man who has served in Congress in the past twenty-five years.

It is seldom a man receives the full measure of credit for work performed during his lifetime by the generation in which he lived, but future historians, in reviewing the work of Congress for the past half century, will accord to Senator ALLISON no inconspicuous place in the galaxy of American statesmen.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, WILLIAM B. ALLISON was reared and largely educated in Ohio, but it was Iowa that gave him to the Nation and to history. It was Iowa that gave him that long tenure of public place essential to enable the country to understand so great, but so quiet and so unostentatious, a man.

The State of Iowa is not without her pride in her great Senators, Grimes, Harlan, Wright, Wilson, Kirkwood, and Gear, and her great jurists, Miller, Dillon, and McCrary, and her great soldiers, Curtis and Dodge; but never, perhaps, will the history of Iowa contain another name of which she will be so proud as that of WILLIAM B. ALLISON.

His early life did not differ from that of thousands of American boys born and reared on frontier farms. Born of Scotch-Irish parents, David Robinson, jr., one of ALLISON'S schoolmates at Wooster Academy and Western Reserve College, in a letter to Miss Carrie Harrison, quotes Judge John Baxter, late United States circuit judge, as saying that Senator ALLISON was reared on the Shorter Catechism, the Westminster Confession of Faith, and a pretty light diet on Sunday. In the lapse of nearly fourscore years he never escaped from the influence of that training, and was molded by it all the days of his life.

When there came at the close of the dark ages an awakening of the human intellect, there was produced an age of scholasticism; and from that time to our own a familiarity with the classics has been regarded as almost the one essential of a liberal education. It was only yesterday that this notion began to be abandoned at the universities. WILLIAM B. ALLISON, practical even in his boyhood, was never a brilliant success in the classics, but excelled all his associates in such practical studies as orthography and mathematics.

His public service as a Representative of Iowa commenced in 1860, when, with the Hon. WILLIAM P. HEPBURN and many subsequently noted in Iowa's history, he represented that State in the convention that nominated Abraham Lincoln for the Presidency. Forty-four years later he headed the Iowa delegation to the convention that nominated Roosevelt and Fairbanks.

He became a Member of this House March 4, 1863. The other Iowa Members at that time were:

James F. Wilson, long chairman of the Judiciary Committee, one of the managers on the part of the House in the impeachment of President Johnson, and later for many years the colleague of Senator ALLISON in the Senate.

Hiram Price, who bore the reputation of being better able to tell what the people of the country wanted and would demand than any man in public life in his time.

J. B. Grinnel, a sturdy enemy of slavery, whose name has been given to a prosperous Iowa city and to an excellent and growing college within that State.

John A. Kasson, long celebrated in American politics and a distinguished American diplomatic representative abroad, still living in this city.

There was also Judge Hubbard, the brilliant and able father of the present Member from the Eleventh District of Iowa.

That was an illustrious company Mr. ALLISON met in his first Congress: Thaddeus Stevens, Owen Lovejoy, Henry Winter Davis, Elihu B. Washburn, George W. Julian, John A. J. Creswell, George S. Boutwell, Henry L. Dawes, Reuben E. Fenton, Robert C. Schenck, James A. Garfield, William D. Kelly, James G. Blaine, Schuyler Colfax, S. S. Cox, and George H. Pendleton.

Surrounded by such men WILLIAM B. ALLISON became, in his second term, a member of the Ways and Means Committee of this body. That committee was then of even greater importance than now, for it had all its present jurisdiction and all that of the Committee on Appropriations, and all the appropriating jurisdiction of the Committees on Military, Naval, Foreign, and Indian Affairs, and of the Committees on Agriculture and Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

To acquire so soon an appointment on such a committee, even in the time of peace, would have been unusual, but to have acquired it during the civil war in a Congress embracing such distinguished men as I have mentioned and many more was, indeed, extraordinary.

Mr. ALLISON served eight years in this body and more than thirty-five years in the Senate. His service in the Senate was longer than was ever accorded any American citizen, and his combined service in the two Houses was longer than that of any other man in American history, save one. Those who have known him best in his later life, when sobered by time and responsibilities, have always regarded him as distinctly conservative, but in his early history he was constantly referred to as an earnest radical.

In 1878, when a free-silver bill had passed this House and the political parties were vying with each other in their efforts to pander to the sentiment for free silver, it was WILLIAM B. ALLISON who had the courage to defy public sentiment and to defeat that project, now substantially unanimously conceded to have been a highly vicious one. For more than thirty years WILLIAM B. ALLISON has been the most powerful single individual in either House of Congress, and the statement of William E. Curtis is the simple truth, that—

WILLIAM B. ALLISON has written more into the laws of his country than any other statesman in any nation of the world.

WILLIAM B. ALLISON was never spectacular; but he was an able, high-minded, earnest, patriotic man, with supreme confidence in his country and its future; and it is no exaggeration to say that while others have with greater dash and brilliancy accomplished more in a given length of time, his ability and nearly half a century of service have enabled him to render his country more of valuable service in the aggregate than has been rendered by any other man in the American Congress in all its history.

So applicable to Senator ALLISON are the words of Garfield concerning Senator Sherman, I use them with but slight necessary modification:

You ask for his monument. I point you to forty-five years of national statutes. Not one great beneficent law has been placed on our statute books without his intelligent and powerful aid. He aided in formulating the laws to raise the great armies and navies which carried us through the war. His hand was seen in the workmanship of those statutes that restored and brought back "the unity and married calm of the States." His hand was in all that great legislation that created the war currency, and in the still greater work that redeemed the promises of the Government and made that currency equal to gold. For forty-five years he has trodden the perilous heights of public duty and against all the shafts of malice has borne his breast unharmed. He has stood in the blaze of "that fierce light that beats against the throne," but its fiercest ray has found no flaw in his armor and no stain upon his shield.

If all the countless hosts of those who have known and loved WILLIAM B. ALLISON were asked what his most distinguished characteristic was, each would in substance say, "His kindliness of soul."

This man made every acquaintance a friend by his loving kindness. This dear, kind, lovable old man left no immediate family to mourn his departure, but the people of this nation had become to him as his family, and, molded by a mother's Christian teachings and mellowed by age, his loving kindness took in all the children of the Republic; and so, when he died, although neither father nor mother, nor sister nor brother, nor wife nor child of his blood attended the obsequies, the people, whose friend and beloved he was, sincerely mourned.

Truly,

Kind words are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE HON. ASBURY C. LATIMER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the next order.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. FINLEY, by unanimous consent—

Ordered, That at the conclusion of other special orders Sunday, February 21, there be a session of the House for the delivery of eulogies on the life, character, and public services of the Hon. ASBURY C. LATIMER, late a Member of the United States Senate from the State of Carolina.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration of the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 585.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. ASBURY CHURCHWELL LATIMER, late a Member of the Senate of the United States from the State of South Carolina, which occurred at Providence Hospital in the city of Washington February 20, 1908.

Resolved, That the business of the House is now suspended that opportunity may be given to pay tribute to his memory.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public services, the House at the conclusion of the memorial exercises of the day shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] will take the chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, once more the Representatives of 80,000,000 of people assemble, neither to engage in partisan debate nor to consider great questions of state. This occasion is one which demands no call of the "yeas and nays." It is of the highest privileged nature accorded any issue in this presence.

In these closing days of the session appropriation bills require early attention and great economic questions press hard for consideration and solution, but they have no bearing on the purpose of this assembling. We are here to do honor to the memory of a deceased colleague, the late Senator ASBURY CHURCHWELL LATIMER.

It is a fit occasion for serious contemplation of the fate that, sooner or later, awaits us all. For man must die.

Earth, that nourished thee, shall claim
Thy growth, to be resolved to earth again;
And, lost each human trace, surrendering up
Thine individual being, shalt thou go
To mix forever with the elements. * * *
Thou shalt lie down
With patriarchs of the infant world—with kings,
The powerful of the earth—the wise, the good,
Fair forms, and hoary seers of the past—
All in one mighty sepulcher. The hills,
Rock ribbed and ancient as the sun; the vales,
Stretching in pensive quietness between
The venerable woods; rivers that move
In majesty; and the complaining brooks
That make the meadows green; and poured round all,
Old Ocean's gray and melancholy waste—
Are but the solemn decorations, all,
Of the great tomb of Man.

The late Senator LATIMER was born near Lowndesville, Abbeville County, S. C., on July 31, 1851. Just one year ago yesterday he died in this city. How strikingly did his death exemplify that "in the midst of life, we are in the midst of death." In the prime of mature manhood, with the future beckoning alluringly onward, seized with a sudden malady, in a startlingly short interval of time this man of splendid physique, robust constitution, and superb vitality passed away like "the foam on the fountain, the dew on the heather." Born on a farm and reared as hundreds of his neighbors and thousands of the citizens of his State, young LATIMER received his education from the country school. He then engaged in farming. He was successful in his pursuits and soon became a substantial citizen. In recalling what impressions of our departed colleague remain most striking on us, we are reminded that—

If our virtues
Did not go forth of us, 't were all alike
As if we had them not. Spirits are not finely touch'd
But to fine issues, nor Nature never lends
The smallest scruple of her excellence
But, like a thrifty goddess, she determines Herself the glory of a creditor,
Both thanks and use.

Senator LATIMER's personality was that of the distinctly persevering type—forceful and aggressive, forever pressing forward. He was a typical homespun man, who overcame great obstacles deemed insurmountable by many in his early struggles, and from his youth on his individuality left its impress with each encounter with his fellow-man. LATIMER was not reckoned a power in the politics of his State until the early nineties. Up to that time the people of Belton, S. C., his friends and neighbors, considered him a safe, prudent, thrifty farmer, of practical ideas and plenty of energy, which combination brought a fair degree of success to his agricultural pursuits.

In 1892 he was the head official of the Farmers' Alliance and became a candidate for Congress against George Johnstone, who is a ripe scholar and a superb orator. The dogged tenacity of purpose, aggressiveness, and perseverance which characterized the entire life of the man wonderfully demonstrated themselves in the campaign, and the outcome of the race was a safe majority for LATIMER over the brilliant Representative who had acquired something of a national reputation, even in one term of service in this body. Entering the House in the Fifty-third Congress, he served continuously throughout the Fifty-seventh, declining then to stand for reelection after his ten years of service for his people.

His zeal, energy, and perseverance as a Representative were stamped with the seal of approval by the people of his district, for they returned him every time he sought that honor. In the beginning of his career in Congress, Senator LATIMER was far more familiar with "Clark's Commentaries on the Bible" and the rules of the Methodist Church than he was with the Constitution of the United States and the rules of the House of Representatives. Realizing the lack of certain training for participation in great debate and without essaying the rôle of a student of great economics, he never attempted any "floor-leader" actions. But in the line of official duty immediately concerning his people—their wants and wishes—he served them diligently and effectively. And the bonds of intelligent sympathy and interest between them grew steadily as the years rolled by.

Six years ago he was chosen United States Senator from South Carolina in the primary election, defeating five of the most prominent men in the State who were aspirants for the honor. The same quiet, unostentatious course that characterized his service in the House was perseveringly pursued in the Senate Chamber. There was nothing of the statesman of the old school about LATIMER, and he made no pretensions that there were. He made no plays to the galleries, but quietly and faithfully attended to his official duties, serving the people of his State to the best of his ability, without attempting to focus the limelight upon himself. Whenever he took the floor it was to say something of immediate purpose affecting some legislation his people were interested in or would be benefited by.

In addition to his individuality and perseverance, he was distinctly a practical man, possessed of an abundance of good, hard common sense. And although the farmer lad grew up to fill one of the greatest offices within the gift of the people of his State, he remained throughout his continued honors and promotions the same strong, natural type of man. His fifteen years of service in Congress made him none the less affable and approachable to his old friends and neighbors and the constituents of his State. There was a native ease and simplicity and dignity in his mannerism and bearing.

Some writer has said of Robert Burns:

No wonder the people of Scotland loved Burns as, perhaps, never people loved a poet. He not only sympathized with the wants, the trials, the joys and sorrows of their obscure lot, but he interpreted these to themselves and interpreted them to others, and this, too, in their own language. He made the poorest plowman proud of his station and his toil, since Robbie Burns has shared and sung them. He awoke a sympathy for them in many a heart that otherwise would never have known it.

Even so, the farm lad of Abbeville County, S. C., strove against his early obstacles and disadvantages of thorough mental training for the important work of national legislation; yet with his personality and perseverance, he pressed forward, not backward, and, finding a seat in the Nation's Council by the will of his people, he exerted his energies and position to be of practical benefit to them. And the same zeal and fidelity marked his career in the Senate. His advocacy of good roads and the improvement of the rural free delivery so continuously, measures with which he was familiar and could exert to their furthermost his zeal and influence in Congress, constrain one to the thought that it was the crying need for just reforms in the far-away rural sections of his old congressional district and his State that incited LATIMER to offer whatever energies were at his command for the lasting benefit and advantage of his people.

And in the heyday of his manhood—strong, hale, hearty—in the zenith of his public career, rounding out a term in the Senate of the United States, apparently with a long future of continued success and honors awaiting him, the "grim ferryman" bade this distinguished mortal embark in that mysterious craft bound for that "bourne from whence no traveler returns." Thus died the kind father, the affectionate husband, the devout churchman, the practical legislator.

What is death
To him who meets it with an upright heart?
A quiet haven, where his shattered bark
Harbors secure, till the rough storm is passed,
Perhaps a passage overhung with clouds,
But at its entrance, a few leagues beyond
Opening to kinder skies and milder suns
And seas pacific as the soul that seeks them.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is sometimes difficult to realize that the permanent absence from among us which we call "death" has overtaken a friend. So to-day many of us find it difficult to realize that the absence from among us of Senator LATIMER is anything more than one of those temporary separations of friends so common among those who are in public life.

My acquaintance and friendship with Senator LATIMER were brief. I knew him casually as a pleasant, active, friendly Member of the Senate until in the closing days of the Fifty-ninth Congress we were both appointed—he by the President of the Senate, I by the Speaker of this House—as members of the Immigration Commission. The duties of that commission naturally threw us into close connection. I learned not only to regard him with respect, but with esteem and affection. There was that about him, as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] has mentioned, which drew to him the regard of men. His great frame incased a great heart, a great feeling, a great sympathy.

I can see him now in our earlier days on the steamer crossing the Atlantic, when we were, as members of a commission, to be a great deal together, forming the acquaintance of each other. I can even yet bring back the memory of the long consultations, in which his native ability, rising far above the deficiencies of an early education, drove and drove and drove, until the knowledge he desired upon any particular point was safely in his possession, and once in his possession, never forgotten.

I have said that he had early deficiencies of education. He had no early or other deficiencies of comprehension. He was capable of ideas embracing propositions of the greatest scope. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] has alluded to his interest in good roads. I have never known a man, here or elsewhere, to entertain a more ambitious project than that of Senator LATIMER in relation to the good roads of the United States. Upon the subject of good roads and agriculture he was always intent.

His long training and deep interest in those subjects made him translate nearly every subject into the elements of either. I served with him on a subcommittee of the commission in southern Italy, in the island of Sicily, and I undertake to say that before he left Italy, assigned as he subsequently was to northern Italy, to which committee I was not, he knew the value of farm lands from one end of Italy to the other, the productiveness of the acreage in each part, the crops which would grow best everywhere, and it was nothing for him when journeying over the magnificent roads of southern Italy to stop the carriage and have some one who accompanied us with a camera to get out and take view after view of those splendid roads, to assist, as he frankly said, in the education, when he got back, of the American public on the subject of the benefit of good roads.

He was an intense man. It is not extraordinary to me why he succeeded; he could not help success with the force and the power of his great intellectuality and the interest which he had in all the subjects within the scope of his desires. Not only did he translate everything he saw abroad into the terms of agriculture and good roads, but, above all, he translated them into terms of betterment for the people of his State. He was one of those men who were useful in service for his community. He gauged all things possible by whether it would be better or worse for the people whom he represented; and as to whether the interests of South Carolina would be bettered or not by the things that he saw, so he judged them.

A simple, kindly man, but full at all times of natural dignity. From amongst the farming class of the country, the sturdiest class in our country, this man came; but he was at home everywhere. I have stood with him before high officials and watched his conferences with them. I have been with him at one conference or audience with a king of a European country; and it was all the same with Senator LATIMER, whether it was a colleague here, a farmer in his district in South Carolina, or the King of Italy, surrounded by the pomp and circumstance of his great office.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] has alluded to the fact that when he came to Congress he was, perhaps, more familiar with Clark's Commentaries on the Bible than he was with either the Constitution or Jefferson's Manual. The familiarity with the commentaries and with the Book concerning which the commentaries were written, continued to the end. On the steamer going over, we Americans of the commission rather surprised, I think, some of the other passengers. On the Sunday afternoon, in addition to the usual morning services, we had gathered around the organ and spent a considerable season in singing familiar gospel hymns. It was a service in which the Senator delighted. I did not at the moment exactly understand it, but I subsequently came to understand it fully. I have been with him in church in a foreign land, and I can testify not only to the depth and intensity of his religious feeling, but to the fact that he carried it with him under foreign flags, and it was as large a part of his daily being as any conditions could have been. I say that I did not at the time understand entirely his liking for these simple hymns; but when, just a year ago, he was taken from us and I was one of those appointed by this House to attend his funeral service at Belton, I gained a wider and more thorough comprehension.

My estimate of Senator LATIMER, already high, was raised by the sight of the church edifice in which he had worshiped. He had never permitted himself to be tempted away from the denomination which he had joined in his youth, though in the town in which he lived it was neither the most popular nor the largest. Around that simple country church no other atmosphere was possible than an atmosphere in which would flourish a real love for and joy in the simplest kind of service of the true gospel. Our friend who has left us was a good husband and a kind and indulgent father. He had few faults, few defects. He was faithful in all things—faithful to his constituents, faithful to his family, and faithful to his State. Like all of us, he had his obvious limitations, but within those limitations he left no one thing undone.

We have heard earlier in the day, in connection with the services in behalf of Senator ALLISON, of the "joy of service." There is such a joy; and during his fifteen years of service in either branch of this National Congress that joy of service was possessed by Senator LATIMER and was his chief and greatest compensation for what he did here.

It is well for a country, well for a State, well for a district, when its Representatives are cast in such a mold. He represented at the same time all that was valuable in the older thought and all that was best in the newer. He was conservative where conservatism could be of benefit, and yet not ashamed, when his belief was formed as to the efficacy of a particular project, to be a radical of the radicals in regard to that.

We can not mourn our friend, because we do not know; beyond the mystery of the dawning of the new life we can not look. This brief, flitting life here is all into which our mortal eye can look, and we can either mourn or rejoice as the life here was. There is none among us who, on the day when he shall separate himself from this life, can look back across the days of his pilgrimage with a clearer conscience and a better sense of duty well performed than Senator LATIMER. With a life like that, why should we mourn for him who is gone? We can rejoice for all the good that was in those fifty-six years. We can offer to those whom he has left sorrowing behind him the consolation that in his life he had many friends; that in his death he has lost none; that his works are written in the history of his country; and that by his living he has contributed something to the betterment of the world—to his part of the world—and so far as in him lay to all the world—contributed his part toward the solving of the great problems, contributed the wisdom and shrewd common sense which Providence gave him to the every-day business of this great legislative body, and to the management and control of things here. As it is, his record is made, and in the golden dawn of the far-off future, when again we shall see him face to face in another world, our desire should be to take to that meeting as good a record as has our friend who left us.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, death walks hand in hand with life. The one is the shadow of the other. Side by side with the strong, robust, healthy, is the ever-present companion of dissolution, decay, death. This fact was never more strikingly illustrated than when, just one year ago, the startling announcement came that Senator ASBURY CHURCHWELL LATIMER was no more. This announcement was a distinct and decided shock to his friends and to the people of South Carolina, who had so long honored him with the highest gifts in their possession. Born and reared upon the farm, trained in early life to invigorating outdoor manual labor, of strong and robust physique, with a constitution that seemed proof against all attack, accustomed to spending his vacation periods in the health-giving, health-preserving atmosphere of upper South Carolina, of even temperament, free from enervating worries, of temperate habits, and genial disposition, he would have been last chosen, in the body of which he was a Member, for grim death's visitation. Surely, in the midst of life we are in death, and surely we know not the hour when that other unknown and unknowable life shall begin. But to him who is strong in Christian faith, death ceases to be a fearful contemplation, and instead becomes a friendly pilot of the weary and worn, the hungry and thirsty, on the pathway from the life earthly to the life heavenly. The Apostle Paul, the greatest of all the inspired philosophers, in his First Epistle to the Corinthians, robs death of its sting by showing it to be the necessary step from corruption to incorruption, from mortality to immortality, from trials and tribulations, cares, and worries, to rest, peace, and endless happiness. How beautifully it is put; how comforting it is:

There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for one star differeth from another star in glory.
So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption:
It is sown in dishonor; it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power:
It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body.
And so it is written, the first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit.
Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual.
The first man is of the earth, earthy: the second man is the Lord from heaven.
As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy: and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly.
And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly.
Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.

Senator LATIMER inherited his love for and interest in agriculture from his father, who was a practical farmer of Abbeville County, S. C., which has given to the State and Nation such a large proportion of those who have labored in war and in peace for the common good. Throughout his life, and especially his public life, the late Senator directed his thoughts and energies to the betterment of farm conditions in his native State. He himself was a practical and most successful farmer. Having early learned the lesson that the prosperity of the southern farmer was greatly retarded because of a lack of improved methods in farm management, he put into practice upon his own farm every theory of farm cultivation and farm-product utilization which had been put into successful operation by the best farmers of the country. It is said that his farm was, in a measure, the model for his entire community, and to this extent and in this respect his influence for good will be felt for years to come.

Senator LATIMER was the product, politically, of the revolution of 1890, which found its inspiration and leadership in the present distinguished senior Senator from South Carolina. He joined earnestly and heartily in that spectacular movement which must always remain a most interesting study to the historian. He was elected to Congress in 1892, and served in this body for ten consecutive years. It can not be said of his service that it was brilliant; he did not aspire to leadership, nor did he enter into the discussion of academic political questions. It can be said of him, however, in entire truthfulness and without the ordinary eulogistic fulsomeness, that he was an effective and energetic worker.

Assiduous in attention to the details of his district work, prompt in the dispatch of business, endowed with plenty of common sense, and ambitious to serve faithfully the people who had honored him, at the end of his ten years of congressional work he was perhaps the most popular man in his entire district. That popularity had extended somewhat to the State, so that when in 1902 he entered the race for the United States Senate in the Democratic primary against five of the very ablest men of the State, it was not surprising that his candidacy was received with considerable cordiality wherever he went. The campaign was hard and exciting, but through it all Senator LATIMER bore himself in such manner as to favorably impress his personality and the integrity of his purposes upon the people, with the result that he was nominated by a handsome majority, and subsequently elected without opposition. In the Senate, as in the House, he was a worker rather than a talker. He will live longest to fame perhaps as the advocate of federal aid to road building. He was regarded by the advocates of this idea as their most enthusiastic and effective champion, and succeeded by numerous public addresses throughout the Union in bringing to the plan considerable and enthusiastic support.

As a member of the Senate Committee on Immigration, he was appointed a member of the Immigration Commission, and during the spring and summer of 1907 toured the northern part of Europe investigating the subject of foreign immigration to this country. This investigation convinced him of the necessity for stricter laws against the influx of undesirable immigrants, and his opinion was set forth in an extensive report.

Of his standing in the Senate I shall let his colleague speak. Senator TILLMAN says:

We have been warm personal friends and political allies for nineteen years. I first became acquainted with him when I was governor of the State, and we have been warm friends ever since.

Senator SMITH of Michigan says:

He was unpretentious, kindly, generous; always just and strong in his likes and dislikes. When he gave his friendship he gave without limit. He was a manly man in every sense, and if he had lived to work out his career, which was evidently open to him in the Senate, he would have become one of the very strong men in that body.

Senator KEAN, of New Jersey, says:

While I did not know the Senator intimately, never having served with him on any committee, I was very sorry to hear of his death. It was a great shock to everyone. If you had looked around the Senate Chamber, and wondered who would be taken next, you would have never selected LATIMER.

Senator CARTER, of Montana, adds this tribute:

His sudden and unexpected death was a great shock to me. His genial personality and kindly disposition endeared him to all of his associates regardless of locality or party affiliations. He will be greatly missed and long remembered.

On the morning of his death the distinguished chaplain of the Senate, Rev. Edward Everett Hale, touchingly referred to Senator LATIMER's death in his opening prayer:

Father, Thou art pleased to show to us day by day, month by month, hour by hour, that we are in Thy presence always and that we pass from this life to that larger life, yes, in an instant, in the twinkling of an eye. Come to us to-day as we learn that another has gone from this circle, and that here and there Thou art pleased that he shall be serving Thee in that larger life. Speak to us, Father, and lead us as only a Father can lead us, by Thine own care and love, that we may learn the lesson of life and of what we call death.
We ask for ourselves, we ask for those who are nearest and dearest to us, we ask for the State that he has served and the Nation, that we may come nearer to Thee and enter into Thy divine life.

Senator LATIMER was a member of the Methodist Church, and in this connection I desire to read from the Southern Christian Advocate, the organ of the Methodist Church in South Carolina, its tribute and that of his immediate pastor to the late Senator:

[Southern Christian Advocate.]

SENATOR A. C. LATIMER.

The State of South Carolina is called upon to mourn for one of her most honored citizens, Senator ASBURY C. LATIMER. After an operation upon him in a hospital in Washington, D. C., he died of peritonitis Thursday morning, February 20, 1908. His family was with him in his last hours. He was about 57 years of age.
Senator LATIMER was a man of high Christian character, and made a clean and pure representative in Congress. He was faithful in the discharge of his duties, both to church and state. A good and noble Christian man has been called to his reward on high. At our request, his pastor, Rev. R. L. Holroyd, has prepared the following tribute to his memory:
"In the death of Senator A. C. LATIMER, South Carolina Methodism has lost one of her most prominent members and staunchest friends. The Belton Church has lost a tower of strength. Brother LATIMER was not only a liberal contributor to the church both at home and abroad, but he was a wise counselor and a sincere friend to the cause. The people had confidence in his religious life. His public prayers were very earnest and touching. Often have I seen him and many of the congregation bathed in tears after what might be called one of his 'face-to-face talks with God.' He loved to talk to his friends on religious subjects. His conversion was clear-cut and unquestioned. He had his days of trial, but he never lost his hold on God.

"Brother LATIMER possessed for me, after three years of intimate association, a most charming personality. I loved him for his own sake, and now that he is gone, I pen these words with a sad heart—not sad because of any trace of doubt as to his future, but that inherent selfishness that hesitates to give up a loved one, though his state is far better.

"My last conversation with him was at his own home on the evening of December 27, 1907. He was just up from a case of grip and was in a few days to go back to Washington. We raised the question of his personal salvation. He talked freely, as he had done on former occasions. And after rehearsing some of the difficulties in his way, growing out of his public duties, he said, with triumph, 'After all, my faith is stayed on God. I do love His church and His people.' He died very triumphantly. There was no cloud in his sky when the sun went down."

His request was that he buried from the little church at Belton, which he loved, upon which he had bestowed much thought and labor, and where he was for a number of years the faithful superintendent of the Sunday school.

That his neighbors loved him was evidenced by the great number who gathered at the depot at Belton and awaited, in silence, the arrival of the special train that bore his body from Washington; and then through the intervening hours, viewing his body as it lay in the church so quietly and so much like his former self; and through the ceremony as provided in the book of discipline, and at the grave, until the last word was said committing his body to the grave, "Earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust."

One very touching scene in connection with the funeral was the presence near the church of nearly fifty negroes who, desiring to see their former friend, were allowed to pass through the church. With subdued silence, many of them in tears, they viewed his body and went away with heavy hearts. He was a friend to all his people. They will miss him.

Rev. W. T. Tate, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Belton, and Rev. A. J. Cauthen, presiding elder of Anderson district and a former pastor of the deceased, assisted in the funeral services.

I shall now read an editorial from the Press and Banner, of Abbeville County, the county of his birth, and one of the oldest and ablest papers in the State:

[The Press and Banner, Wednesday, February 26, 1908.]

THE LATE SENATOR LATIMER.

The people of the State were shocked to learn of the sudden illness and death of Senator ASBURY CHURCHWELL LATIMER. From the news sent out, hope of his recovery was entertained until his death was announced.

Senator LATIMER'S biography would read like a romance. Left, as a result of the war, with little means, he did not have the advantages of collegiate or even of high-school education, yet with this handicap he attained the highest position in the gift of the people of his State. And it may be truthfully said that he has fulfilled the trust to the satisfaction of his constituents. He was, above all things, a worker, self-reliant and persistent, and while this accounts in large measure for that popularity which kept him for ten years in the lower House and afterwards elected him to the Senate, it must not be forgotten that the ability and aggressiveness that he developed as a stump speaker enabled him to hold at bay some of the strongest men of the State when they entered the lists for the senatorship.

It is also well worthy of note that he was highly esteemed and honored by the Members of the Senate. His appointment by the Senate as one of the commission to visit Europe and investigate the question of immigration is a testimonial of the high esteem in which he was held by that body.

In the life of Senator LATIMER there is a striking illustration of a man truly estimating his own capabilities, and not overestimating his capabilities. He knew the channel of his adaptability and he broadened its scope year by year. Heedless of the small talk, of his lack of fitness that was indulged in by many in the early part of his political career, he bent himself to the task of improving himself, and how well he has done it the record shows.

Mr. Speaker, the career of Senator LATIMER, from a farm boy of limited means and education to a seat in the greatest deliberative body in the world, is only another testimonial to the greatness and glory of our Republic, where all men stand upon a plane of equality and equal opportunity. With us birth, ancestry, wealth, and social position are small considerations in determining our choice of public servants. With us the question can only be, Is he fit, is he honest, is he truly representative of the dominant ideas? It is the man we seek, the man representative of our traditions, history, thought, and aspirations. Further than this we do not look. Ours is truly a government of the people by its representatives for the people.

In conclusion, I read the following beautifully expressed article from the Washington Herald of February 21, 1908:

SENATOR LATIMER'S DEATH.

Death at all times is awesome and profoundly impressive. To journey from out this vale of tears into that undiscovered country whence no traveler returns is to enter a mystery older than the hills and more wondrous than the universe itself.

Never is death more shocking, however, than when it seizes suddenly and almost without warning upon a man in the full bloom of health, strength, and virility—such a man as Senator LATIMER, of South Carolina, appeared to be. A week ago he seemed reasonably sure of many years to come; to-day he is no more. A week ago he stood in the Senate Chamber of the United States—"the greatest and most august deliberative body body on earth," as it has been so often and so truly called—the peer of any Member. His State had no higher honor to offer, his friends no greater boon to ask in his behalf. Nature seemed to have provided him with a robust constitution; pain, sickness, and vital weakness, apparently, were strangers to him. All in a moment his call came; he lingered a little while and passed away. His great office is vacant, his toga laid aside. He is but common clay, sinking into its destined lot.

Men who pause not to contemplate the sadness of this shocking incident in the country's forward march are not true men. The striking down of a public servant against whom no adverse word may be said is not an incident lightly to be thought upon. Those men out yonder on Capitol Hill hold in their keeping the destinies of the proudest republic on earth. In the main they are good men, honest and patriotic. Nevertheless, we laugh at them, gibe them, criticise them, and often abuse them a good deal more than the occasion always justifies. We do this, perhaps, because it is our way of doing things; as a matter of fact, we entertain for them down in our hearts a large measure of respect.

The passing of Senator LATIMER—more than usually pathetic, as such things go—moves us to profound sorrow. He seemingly had so much to live for; to die upon the threshold of his career in the national forum was sad in the extreme.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Speaker, we feel the real chill of death only when it touches the sacred precincts where friendship and family ties are cherished.

Senator LATIMER and I were reared in the same county. I succeeded him as Representative from the third district of South Carolina after his promotion to the United States Senate. The most cordial relations existed between us to the day of his death. All of us have known him as an able and faithful representative; many of us have known him as a man and a friend.

To my mind, there is no public man of recent years whose career is so rich in lessons of hope and inspiration to struggling youth as that of our lamented friend. He belongs decidedly to that class referred to by Lord Bacon, who achieved rather than inherited greatness. What his opportunity was, that was the exact measure of his success. ASBURY CHURCHWELL LATIMER was born near Lowndesville, Abbeville County, S. C., July 31, 1851. Coming to young manhood during the wreck of estates succeeding the war of secession, he, like so many southern youths of this period, gave of his time to labor in repairing the ravages of war at the cost of his better education, which was limited to the opportunities afforded by the disorganized common schools of that day.

On the 26th of June, 1877, Mr. LATIMER was married to Miss Sara Alice Brown, of Belton, S. C., and to them were born five children, all of whom survive. Shortly after his marriage he moved to Belton, Anderson County, adjoining the county of his birth.

As a young man, Mr. LATIMER was not dainty in selecting his work. His motto was, "That success lay not in the character of the work, but in the vim and thoroughness with which it was executed." Better things came to him because he did well the things of less import.

In 1890 Mr. LATIMER was elected chairman of the Democratic party in Anderson County, and was reelected in 1892. So well did his career commend itself to the people of that county that he was proposed as a candidate for Congress, and was elected in 1892, serving continuously for ten years. In a heated primary, in which he was opposed by some of the ablest men of South Carolina, he was elected to the United States Senate in 1902. His further public career is a matter of public record here.

Mr. LATIMER grew with his opportunities. When elected to Congress he had never held office and knew not the arts of public speaking. But the good name of an honest and strong-minded ancestry was his heritage, and with these he linked frankness of speech and that energy that commanded success. Realizing the great opportunity afforded to the observant man by service in Congress, he set himself to the task of self-improvement. Not only did he get a ready grasp of affairs in Congress, but he developed into one of the most effectual stump speakers in his State. He knew well the channel of his capabilities, and he seldom ventured beyond, but with each setting sun he broadened and deepened this channel.

Stranger than fiction is the fact of mortal existence. Some men spend their lives in the mire; some reach only the foothills; while a few climb to the eagle's crag on the cloud-shaded summit.

And they die an equal death—the idler and the man of mighty deeds.

When death claimed Senator LATIMER on the 20th day of February, 1908, he was strong and vigorous of mind and body. Ripening experiences had made him a safe counselor and an able Representative. He was open to the appeal of his people and effectual in executing their wishes. Humanly speaking, we would stay the dread messenger who would strike man in the prime of his usefulness when, from his vantage ground, he could direct the steps and lighten the burdens of the struggling masses. This Senator LATIMER did for his fellow-men, individually and collectively. Many were the young men, helplessly poor, who have been lifted by him to better things. His heart was tuned to sympathy's appeal, when in the struggles of his youth he felt her gentle touch. He championed the cause of the masses, and there he found that generous response that elevated him to position and stimulated him to higher and nobler endeavor.

He held his seat; a friend to human race.

When the shadows gather, when the waves of eternity break at our very feet, we pause in awe for a little moment, and with bowed head and with bated breath and in sorrow we lay our dead to rest. But what is that which we do not and can not bury? Yesterday it moved and animated this helpless mass, holding it up face to face with God, in whose image it was created. This is the spark of divinity, the real man. And is it dead? No more than the steam dies that yesterday quickened the giant locomotive. Returned to its original elements, yes; but not dead. Scientists tell us that annihilation is impossible in nature. Our thoughts, our words, our deeds—these are but evidences of the existing soul. These live when empires have crumbled. Then who will say that the fountain from which they spring has perished? Who will say that nature, constant in all things, in this one instant reverses its law and permits the annihilation of the soul?

No; in the essentials of being, our friend still lives, and will live throughout the ceaseless ages. Addison, the greatest of English critics, said of the soul:

The stars shall fade away, the sun himself
Grow dim with age, and nature sink in years.
But thou shalt flourish in immortal youth,
Unhurt amidst the wars of elements,
The wreck of matter, and the crush of worlds.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, were it not for the many amiable and endearing qualities that won my friendship for the late Senator ASBURY C. LATIMER, I would not be here paying my meed of praise to his memory. His strong individuality marked him as a man of commanding intellect, of strength of character, and determined will that brought him to the exalted position which he held in the Senate and which had found recognition by service for five terms in the House of Representatives. To serve sixteen years continuously in the highest legislative councils of the Nation is a distinction rarely achieved and shared only by those who have special merit and who prove by their devotion to service and loyalty to cause their worthiness of trust and confidence. But too rarely does this sacrificing service meet with proper appreciation by constituents whose representatives seek to do their utmost in their behalf.

A fourth of his living years was spent in the public service. The inestimable record he bequeathed to the State he honored is measured by the high reputation he gained in this long period that no suspicion of disloyalty to trust was ever cast upon his fair name.

With the untarnished record in public, private, and civic life that Senator ASBURY C. LATIMER bestowed upon his State, South Carolina may well place in its hall of notables this exemplar of civic righteousness, exalted purpose, and devoted public service, to be remembered by the present and coming generations as worthy of emulation and pride. If her succeeding public servants prove as faithful to trust as this dutiful citizen of the Republic, its interests and that of the Union will be secure so long as the sisterhood of States remains intact.

A year has passed since his friends and colleagues were startled by the death of this apparently strong and well man, and in that brief span of a twelvemonth the appreciation in which he was held by his colleagues has not abated, nor will the perspective of history change the estimate that was placed upon him by his coworkers, who were best placed to judge of his work and of his worth.

The trait that impressed me most and must have left similar impression upon others was the absence of all sectional feeling in his attitude toward men and measures. He breathed no spirit of hate or hostility toward the North, though he was born and his young manhood was spent in the days of his State's travail following the civil war. It is this mellowing trait that so reflects the life, attitude, and trend of the new South that made Senator LATIMER a living exponent in principle and in achievement of the new policy of rejuvenation and rehabilitation of the Southland.

His labors in the cause of immigration and of movements indissolubly connected with his State and country's best development show that he was abreast in thought and movement, and was keen to recognize the opportunities of the present and the potentialities of the future.

Death has leveled the man of strong body and iron will to the memory of the past. Among the many Senators whose deaths in the last session eclipsed in somber shadow both House and Senate, no one is more sincerely missed than the illustrious son of the Palmetto State. He had a geniality that won him friends on first meeting. None could be his enemy and everyone his confidant. His beaming and open countenance reflected the honesty of purpose that was the inspiriting motive in all his career. No wonder, then, that as the representatives of the Senate and House returned the erstwhile healthy body to the native clay of South Carolina, Senators and Representatives who had associated with him in daily legislative work for years were really grieved at the loss of this sage counselor, wise legislator, and true friend.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, on the 20th day of February last the announcement was made to the House that the Hon. ASBURY CHURCHWELL LATIMER, an honored Member of the Senate of the United States, a former Member of this body, and a distinguished citizen of the State of South Carolina, had passed away. Senator LATIMER's illness was of short duration. He died at Providence Hospital, in this city, surrounded by the members of his family—his sorrowing wife and grief-stricken children. Everything that human agency could accomplish had been employed to prolong his life and to combat the fatal disease. On an occasion like this we are brought face to face with the realities of life and the certainty of death; that when life's activities are ended we must cross the river, where passengers go over, but do not return. We pass from mortality in this life to immortality beyond the grave.

And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul.

I have never been able to understand how one can believe otherwise than in the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. This life is but a span; the future is eternity. Preparation is made here for the life to come. We have the great apostle saying:

If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable.

So that the man whose hope in Christ extends beyond the grave, at death is not miserable.

Senator LATIMER was born July 31, 1851, on his father's farm near Lowndesville, Abbeville County, S. C., where his early life was spent. His father was a farmer, and the future Senator was brought up inured to all the practices and usages incident to a boy's life on the farm. He attended the old-fashioned country school. When his services were needed, he labored on the farm. His early experiences included the years preceding and including the civil war. When this cruel war was over, the people of the Southland commenced anew the struggles of life, and the future Senator, in common with others, worked. This, however, proves the stability of our institutions—that the way to the highest position is open to all. Senator LATIMER possessed splendid talent for business. He succeeded to an eminent degree in all of his business undertakings. In the memorable campaign of 1876, when the white people of South Carolina used every effort to redeem the State from carpetbag, scalawag, and negro domination, Senator LATIMER played an important part. Bold, aggressive, and patriotic, he assumed a leadership that inspired his neighbors and produced results. I remember how Anderson, his home county, contributed largely to the election of Wade Hampton, governor of South Carolina, and the restoration of white rule in the Palmetto State. In 1890 he took an active part in party politics, contributing to the election of governor, now Senator, BENJAMIN RYAN TILLMAN. He declined to permit his friends to use his name for lieutenant-governor on the ticket with Governor TILLMAN.

In 1892 he was elected to Congress from the Third Congressional District of South Carolina; was reelected to the Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, Fifty-sixth, and Fifty-seventh Congresses. During his ten years' service in Congress he endeared himself to his constituents by industriously looking after their welfare in a material way. In 1902 he was elected to the United States Senate over strong competition in the Democratic primary. Senator LATIMER had at heart the welfare of the rural population. He labored industriously to promote their interest. On account of his environments, largely conditions growing out of the civil war, he was denied ample educational advantages. He made up for this in a large measure by effort and continuous industry in after life. Success in life must be measured by results accomplished. Judged by this standard, Senator LATIMER's life was a success. He started in life handicapped by many disadvantages. He earned the good will and well done of the people amongst whom he lived. He achieved political prominence and wealth. On the occasion of his funeral, one year ago to-day in the Methodist Church where for a quarter of a century he attended and was an active and influential member, at his home town, Belton, S. C., the highest tribute that could be paid to Senator LATIMER was paid by his neighbors, rich and poor. Every class of those amongst whom he lived sorrowed and lamented for that they had lost—a friend. "Peace to his ashes."

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Members who desire to do so may have leave within five days to print remarks in the RECORD on the life, character, and public services of the late Senator LATIMER.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Now, in pursuance of the several resolutions and as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the House (at 5.28 o'clock p. m.) stands adjourned until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 22, 1909.

The Chaplain, Rev. Edward E. Hale, offered the following prayer:

The Lord hath made bare his holy arm in the eyes of all the nations, and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God.

* * * * * * *

Who raised up the righteous man? Who gave the nations before him and made him rule over kings? Who hath wrought it and done it? I, the Lord, the first and the last. I am He.

Let us pray.

Father of life, Father of love, Almighty God, we come to Thee to-day to look back upon the memory of him who was the leader of this land in its weakness, in its doubt, in its difficulty—the first in war, the first in peace, the first in the hearts of his countrymen.

Father Almighty, come to us in this day as Thou wert pleased to come to him. Lead Thy servants to-day as in Thine infinite providence and by Thy law Thou wert pleased to lead him. Such men do not come to us by accident. They come to us because they seek the living God with all their heart and soul and strength.

And this is for this Nation to-day. Oh, that this were that happy people whose God is the Lord. Teach us and teach our children's children what it is to sanctify law—to make holy Thy law in our law; in our daily lives to go and come as the children of the living God. Show us how to bear each other's burdens, how to lift up what has fallen down, how to open eyes that are blind and ears that are deaf. Point out to us Thine acceptable way. And, Father, make us always grateful to those who have led us through the desert as he whom we remember to-day led us in his day.

Our Father who art in Heaven, hallowed be Thy name, Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, on earth as it is done in Heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us. Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil, for Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever and ever. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. George Washington's Farewell Address will be read, by the order of the Senate, by the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN]. The Senator will take the place at the Secretary's desk provided for him.

Mr. MCLAURIN read the address, as follows:

To the people of the United States:

FRIENDS AND FELLOW-CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed to decline being considered among the number of those out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you at the same time to do me the justice to be assured that this resolution has not been taken without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that in withdrawing the tender of service, which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest, no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness, but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this previous to the last election had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence impelled me to abandon the idea. I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety, and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed toward the organization and administration of the Government the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and every day the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is intended to terminate the career of my political life my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me, and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise and as an instructive example in our annals that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead; amidst appearances sometimes dubious; vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging; in situations in which not unfrequently want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism, the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts and a guaranty of the plans by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence; that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual; that the free Constitution which is the work of your hands may be sacredly maintained; that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue; that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare which can not end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger natural to that solicitude, urge me on an occasion like the present to offer to your solemn contemplation and to recommend to your frequent review some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all-important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget as an encouragement to it your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people is also now dear to you. It is justly so, for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence, the support of your tranquillity at home, your peace abroad, of your safety, of your prosperity, of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth, as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed, it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it, accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can in any event be abandoned, and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth or choice of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have in a common cause fought and triumphed together. The independence and liberty you possess are the work of joint counsels and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings, and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest. Here every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The North, in an unrestrained intercourse with the South, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise and precious materials of manufacturing industry. The South, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the North, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the North, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes in different ways to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength to which itself is unequally adapted. The East, in a like intercourse with the West, already finds, and in the progressive improvements of interior communications by land and water will more and more find, a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad or manufactures at home. The West derives from the East supplies requisite to its growth and comfort, and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the West can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While, then, every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined can not fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations, and what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same governments, which their own rivalships alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues would stimulate and embitter. Hence, likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments which, under any form of government, are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the Union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? Let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who in any quarter may endeavor to weaken its bands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our union, it occurs as matter of serious concern that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations—northern and southern, Atlantic and western—whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You can not shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heartburnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head. They have seen in the negotiation by the Executive and in the unanimous ratification by the Senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at that event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the General Government and in the Atlantic States unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties—that with Great Britain and that with Spain—which secure to them everything they could desire in respect to our foreign relations toward confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? Will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such there are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your union a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute. They must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances in all times have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay by the adoption of a constitution of government better calculated than your former for an intimate union and for the efficacious management of your common concerts. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government. But the constitution which at any time exists, till changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish government presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations, under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberation and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize faction; to give it an artificial and extraordinary force; to put in the place of the delegated will of the Nation the will of a party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community, and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill-concerted and incongruous projects of faction rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans, digested by common counsels and modified by mutual intesrests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely in the course of time and things to become potent engines by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government, destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Toward the preservation of your Government and the permanency of your present happy state it is requisite not only that you steadily discountenance irregular oppositions to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretexts. One method of assault may be to effect in the forms of the Constitution alterations which may impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what can not be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments as other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country; that facility in changes upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion exposes to perpetual change, from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion; and remember especially that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular reference to the founding of them on geographical discriminations. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

The spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual, and sooner or later the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purposes of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight), the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasionally riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which find a facilitated access to the Government itself through the channels of party passion. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true, and in governments of a monarchical cast patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose, and there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be by force of public opinion to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming it should consume.

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominates in the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions by the others, has been evinced by experiments, ancient and modern, some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If in the opinion of the people the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked. Where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principles.

It is substantially true that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric? Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering also that timely disbursements to prepare for danger frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions in time of peace to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burthen which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives; but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty it is essential that you should practically bear in mind that toward the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper objects (which is always a choice of difficulties) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the Government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice toward all nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct. And can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and at no distant period a great nation to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt that in the course of time and things the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it? Can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded, and that in place of them just and amicable feelings toward all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges toward another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur.

Hence frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation prompted by ill will and resentment sometimes impels to war the government contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject. At other times it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty, of nations has been the victim.

So, likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter without adequate inducement or justification. It leads also to concessions to the favorite nation of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens (who devote themselves to the favorite nation) facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country without odium, sometimes even with popularity, gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation a commendable deference of public opinion or a laudable zeal for public good the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils! Such an attachment of a small or weak toward a great and powerful nation dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter. Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence (I conjure you to believe me, fellow-citizens) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike of another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots who may resist the intrigues of the favorites are liable to become suspected and odious, while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not legally hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interests, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world, so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than to private affairs that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But, in my opinion, it is unnecessary and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, liberal intercourse with all nations are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand, neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the Government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be not greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish—that they will control the usual current of the passions or prevent our Nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations. But if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good—that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism—this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far in the discharge of my official duties I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is that I have at least believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice and by that of your Representatives in both Houses of Congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take and was bound in duty and interest to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance, and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without anything more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity toward other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress without interruption to that degree of strength and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence, and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love toward it which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations, I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize without alloy the sweet enjoyment of partaking in the midst of my fellow-citizens the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever-favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors, and dangers.

GO: WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, September 19, 1796.

COMMISSION ON COUNTRY LIFE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, submitting an estimate of appropriation of $25,000 for all necessary expenses to enable the Commission on Country Life to digest, etc., the material already gathered by the commission to complete its work, etc. (S. Doc. No. 734), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a joint memorial of the legislature of Idaho, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(Certificate of certified copy.)

STATE OF IDAHO,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Robert Lansdon, secretary of state of the State of Idaho, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and complete transcript of senate joint memorial No. 3, by Macbeth, to the Honorable Senate of the United States of America in Congress assembled, which was filed in this office the 16th day of February, A. D. 1909, and admitted to record.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State. Done at Boise City, the capital of Idaho, this 16th day of February, A. D. 1909.

[SEAL] ROBERT LANSDON,
Secretary of State.

Senate joint memorial 3. By Mr. Macbeth.

To the honorable Senate of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the legislature of the State of Idaho, respectfully represent that—

Whereas the mining industry we believe to be second in importance only to agriculture; and

Whereas one of the greatest things, in our judgment, to the credit of the United States Government is its cooperation through the Department of Agriculture with the American farmer; and

Whereas we believe a similar cooperation with the miner through a bureau of mines and mining would prove of great assistance to the mining industry; and

Whereas the frequent explosions and the terrible loss of life resulting therefrom, especially in the coal regions of this country, demand the assistance of the Government in discovering some method by which such shocking loss of life may be avoided; and

Whereas the terrible waste in our mining resources is taking place, which through proper assistance from the Federal Government could largely be avoided; and

Whereas we are reliably informed that a bill is now pending in the United States Senate for the creation of a bureau of mines and mining and that such bill has already passed the lower House of Congress: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate of the State of Idaho (the house of representatives concurring therein), That we most respectfully urge upon the United States Senate the importance of an early passage of such bill, and that a copy of this memorial be forwarded to the Secretary of the United States Senate and to our Senators by the secretary of state.

I hereby certify that the within senate joint memorial No. 3, originated in the senate during the tenth session of the legislature of the State of Idaho.

F. A. SHAW,
Secretary of the Senate.

The within senate joint memorial No. 3 passed the senate on the 5th day of February, 1909.

L. H. SWEETSER,
President of the Senate.

The within senate joint memorial No. 3 passed the house of representatives on the 13th day of February, 1909.

PAUL CLAGSTONE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Englewood, N. J.; of New Brighton, Johnstown, Brooklyn, New York City, and Cuba, all in the State of New York, praying for the passage of the so-called "children's bureau bill," which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Honolulu Harbor, No. 54, American Association of Masters, Mates, and Pilots, of Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, praying for the passage of the so-called "Knox bill," concerning licensed officers of steam and sail vessels, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Washington, D. C., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the appointment of a national liquor commission to investigate the effects of the liquor traffic upon the moral and industrial affairs of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Jackson Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Brooks, Me., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the interstate transportation of intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the memorial and executive committee of army posts, Department of New York, Grand Army of the Republic, of Kings County, N. Y., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation placing certain inscriptions upon military monuments, also against the erection of a monument to the memory of Gen. Robert E. Lee, and praying for federal supervision of the erection of monuments upon federal reservations and the placing of inscriptions thereon, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CULLOM presented petitions of sundry citizens of Casey, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in all government buildings, grounds, and ships, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Dahlgren, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the interstate transportation of intoxicating liquors in prohibition districts, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the board of directors of the John Crear Library, of Chicago, Ill., praying that the duty on books be increased and remonstrating against the repeal of the present duty thereon, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HEYBURN presented a joint memorial of the legislature of Idaho, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(Certificate of certified copy.)

PAUL CLAGSTONE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HEYBURN presented petitions of Pocatello Lodge, of Pocatello; Lewiston Lodge, of Lewiston; and Capital City Lodge, of Boise City, all of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, in the State of Idaho, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the creation of a national reserve in Wyoming for the care and maintenance of the American elk, which were referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

Mr. DICK presented memorials of the Typographical Union of Portsmouth, the Typographical Union of Dayton, the Typographical Union of Cincinnati, and the Typographical Union of Cleveland, all of the American Federation of Labor, in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against authorizing the printing in connection with the Census Office being given to private concerns, which were referred to the Committee on the Census.

He also presented petitions of Local Lodges Nos. 77, 295, 37, 208, 363, 523, 797, 419, 93, 422, 448, and 56, of Circleville, Warren, Columbus, Ashtabula, Akron, Piqua, Wilmington, Bellaire, Hamilton, Lebanon, Cambridge, and Mansfield, all of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, in the State of Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to create a national reserve in the State of Wyoming for the care and maintenance of the American elk, which were referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

Mr. TALIAFERRO presented petitions of sundry religious organizations of the State of Florida, praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the interstate transportation of intoxicating liquors, and also to prohibit the importation of opium or other deleterious habit-producing drugs, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a memorial of the Harrington & Richardson Arms Company, of Worcester, Mass., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to regulate the sale of firearms in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WARREN presented a concurrent resolution of the legislature of Wyoming, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE STATE OF WYOMING,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Wyoming, ss:

I, William R. Schnitger, secretary of state of the State of Wyoming do hereby certify that the annexed has been carefully compared with the original enrolled house joint memorial No. 3 of the tenth state legislature of Wyoming, and is a full, true, and correct copy of same, and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Wyoming.

Done at Cheyenne, the capital, this 18th day of February, A. D. 1909.

[SEAL.] WM. R. SCHNITGER,
Secretary of State.

House joint memorial 3, relating to homestead laws.

Memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

Be it resolved by the house of representatives of the legislature of Wyoming, the senate concurring:

Whereas it has been demonstrated that the homestead act providing for the entry and settlement of 160 acres of public land by a qualified entryman does not cover the needs and reach all the conditions in the arid and semiarid sections of the West, owing to soil and climatic circumstances not considered when the homestead laws was passed;

Whereas in the higher altitudes of the Rocky Mountain West the moisture rarely exceeds 12 inches, the seasons are short, and the precipitation variable in quantity and uncertain during the growing season;

Whereas these facts render it necessary to conserve according to the most scientific methods all the moisture that falls in winter, spring, and summer, thus requiring that at least one-half of the tillable area lie fallow each alternate season; and

Whereas the farmer who undertakes to establish a home and make a living for himself and family in a region in which the greatest natural obstacles must be overcome can not with safety depend alone on his crops, but must have some grazing land: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That the house and senate of the Wyoming legislature by joint memorial do hereby indorse and approve the 320-acre homestead bill of Hon. FRANK W. MONDELL, and urge the honorable Congress of the United States to enact the same into law at its present session.

Resolved, that a copy of this memorial be sent to each Member of the Senate and House of Representatives at Washington, D. C.

Approved February 17, 1909.

Mr. WARREN presented a joint memorial of the legislature of Wyoming, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE STATE OF WYOMING,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Wyoming, ss:

I, William R. Schnitger, secretary of state of the State of Wyoming, do hereby certify that the annexed has been carefully compared with the original house enrolled resolution, No. 4, of the tenth state legislature of Wyoming, and is a full, true, and correct copy of same, and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Wyoming.

Done at Cheyenne, the capital, this 18th day of February, A. D. 1909.

[SEAL.] WM. R. SCHNITGER,
Secretary of State.

House joint resolution 4, relating to creating forest reserves.

Be it resolved by the house of representatives, the senate concurring:

Whereas the people of the State of Wyoming are oppressed by the present policy of the National Government in withdrawing large areas of the State from the operation of laws enacted by Congress, thus adding to the expense of maintaining law and order and protecting life and property; and

Whereas the creation of large forest reserves has taken from the State areas which contain many other natural resources aside from timber, which must be properly utilized if the State is to develop and become a prosperous Commonweaith among those of the Union; and

Whereas our people are living under a code of rules and regulations prescribed by the Forest Service rather than under acts of Congress; and

Whereas development is greatly retarded because those responsible for such rules and regulations are unacquainted with conditions; and

Whereas the Forest Service and other bureaus at Washington maintain, at government expense, advertising agencies which mislead the people as to the purpose and work of such bureaus; and

Whereas the people of the State of Wyoming are fully aware that the best and highest use of natural resources is not being made under the supervision of these bureaus and that great waste now occurs which might be easily prevented by a more localized control: Therefore be it

Resolved, by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Wyoming, in legislature assembled, That Congress be, and it is hereby, petitioned to enact such laws as may be necessary for the control of natural resources and to provide an administration of these laws, in order that direct acts of Congress may operate rather than rules and regulations prepared and enforced by an absent landlord; and be it further

Resolved, That Congress be petitioned to take such steps as will place the control and management of natural resources in the hands of the people of States as rapidly as those States prepare for the responsibility; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each Member of Congress and to the chief administrative officers of the Interior and Agricultural Departments.

Approved February 17, 1909.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Brooks, Me., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the interstate transportation of intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Wellington Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Wellington, Me., praying for the passage of the so-called "rural parcels-post bill," which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CURTIS presented a petition of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Mound City, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the interstate transportation of intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of Local Lodge No. 1037, of Junction City; of Local Lodge No. 412, of Pittsburg; of Local Lodge No. 595, of Lawrence; of Local Lodge No. 579, of Fort Scott, and of Local Lodge No. 647, all of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, in the State of Kansas, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the creation of a national reserve in the State of Wyoming for the care and maintenance of the American elk, which were referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Brooks, Me., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the interstate transportation of intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Local Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Wellington, Me., praying for the passage of the so-called "rural parcels-post" and "postal savings banks" bills, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 9191) to amend an act entitled "An act to divide the judicial district of Nebraska into divisions and to provide for an additional district judge in said district," reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. du PONT on the 18th instant, proposing that the annual salary of the United States attorney for the district of Delaware shall be, after the beginning of the fiscal year 1910, $3,000, intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed, which was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 27053) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, to report it with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 1055) thereon. I give notice that I shall ask to have the bill taken up at the earliest practicable time. I hope Senators will give this bill their attention and be prepared to consider it on its merits when it comes up. There is considerable new matter contained in the bill, and it is proposed to consider it at a later hour to-day and to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. DICK, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4434) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to loan naval equipment to certain military schools," approved March 3, 1901, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1057) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4521) to reorganize and enlist the members of the United States Naval Academy Band, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1058) thereon.

Mr. DEPEW, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 19655) providing for an additional judge for the southern district of New York, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1059) thereon.

Mr. HANSBROUGH, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. CULLOM on the 3d instant, proposing to appropriate $5,000 for the erection on the brink of the Grand Canyon in the Grand Canyon Forest Reserve in Arizona, a memorial to the late John Wesley Powell, etc., intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed, which was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 27054) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, to report it without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 1061) thereon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

TERMS OF COURT AT YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO.

Mr. FORAKER. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 27139) to provide for the sittings of the United States circuit and district courts of the northern district of Ohio at the city of Youngstown, in said district, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 1056) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that from and after the passage of this act there shall be held at the city of Youngstown, in the northern district of Ohio, a term of both the circuit and district courts of that district on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in March of each year; that grand and petit jurors summoned for service at the terms of either of the courts aforesaid to be held at the city of Cleveland, may, if in the opinion of the judge holding court in that division the public convenience requires it, be directed to serve also at the term then being held, or herein authorized to be then held, at the city of Youngstown; that prosecutions for crimes or offenses hereafter committed in any part of the eastern division of the district shall be cognizable at the aforesaid terms of either of the courts having jurisdiction thereof, etc.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SMOOT introduced a bill (S. 9440) to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (S. 9441) to amend the Code of Law for the District of Columbia regarding insurance (with an accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 9442) for the relief of Emma L. Hines.

Mr. TAYLOR introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Claims:

Mr. TILLMAN introduced a bill (S. 9447) to authorize and empower J. L. Hankinson, N. B. Dial, and their associates, successors, and assigns, to construct a dam, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan introduced a bill (S. 9448) for the relief of Orlando B. Willcox and certain other army officers and their heirs or legal representatives, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McENERY introduced a bill (S. 9449) for the relief of the Bank of Louisiana, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,840.83 to pay the Boston and Maine Railroad for railway mail service, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,385.22 in settlement of the claim of Pedro Mangalindan, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment relative to the improvement of harbors and landings of the upper Missouri River, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment relating to the improvement of the Missouri River from Sioux City, Iowa, to Fort Benton, Mont., and the Yellowstone River from mouth to Billings, Mont., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $7,444.49 in full settlement of the defalcation of Lyman K. Lane, formerly a clerk in the Union Agency, Okla., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TALIAFERRO submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $250,000 for one steam revenue cutter of the first class for service in the waters of Key West, Fla., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment authorizing the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint J. Randolph Peyton, late a cadet at the Military Academy, at West Point, to the position of second lieutenant of infantry in the army, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Military Academy appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $20,000 for the maintenance of the channel at the mouth of the Apalachicola River, Florida, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STONE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $150,000 to prevent the diversion of the waters of the Missouri River through Lake Contrary and other contiguous lakes, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,875 to pay John H. Bankhead, of Alabama, for services on the Inland Waterways Commission from March 14 to June 18, 1907, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $32,000 to purchase certain Indian relics deposited for safekeeping in the National Museum by Richard C. Adams, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 26916) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. CLAPP, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. OWEN conferees on the part of the Senate.

JUDGES FOR HAWAII, ALASKA, ETC.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 21896) to amend section 86 of an act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, to provide for additional judges, and for other judicial purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. OVERMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed, and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 915) to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors in buildings, ships, navy-yards, and parks and other premises owned or used by the United States Government was announced as first in order.

Mr. CARTER. Let that go to the calendar under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the calendar under Rule IX, at the request of the Senator from Montana.

The bill (S. 6576) to regulate the interstate-commerce shipments of intoxicating liquors was announced as next in order.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In the absence of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], I ask that that bill be passed over for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from Wyoming.

BANKS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 6495) to provide for the incorporation of banks within the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has heretofore been read.

Mr. KEAN. Let it be read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the bill, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. KEAN. On page 4, in section 3, line 20, the bill reads "the 1st day of January, 1909." That needs to be changed. I suggest that it should read "the 1st day of April, 1909."

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; that should be done.

Mr. KEAN. I move that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, page 4, line 20, after the words "day of," it is proposed to strike out "January" and insert "April," so as to read:

SEC. 3. That from and after the 1st day of April, A. D. 1909, no company, association, or corporation shall transact a banking business or maintain an office or banking house where deposits or savings are received within the District of Columbia except associations organized under the national banking act, corporations organized under an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the incorporation of trust, loan, mortgage, and certain other corporations within the District of Columbia," approved October 1, 1890; except also a branch or branches in the District of Columbia of foreign banking corporations which have branches outside the United States and are engaged in international banking, building associations receiving payments from their own members, and corporations organized under this act, and any person, firm, or copartnership now engaged or that may hereafter engage in the business of private banking in the District of Columbia, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, the report of the committee sets forth two amendments. I do not know whether they are included in the bill as printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No committee amendment is indicated on the face of the bill.

Mr. KEAN. If the Secretary will read the report of the committee, he will find that two amendments are indicated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, page 6, line 1, after the word "bank," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, however, That every person, firm, or copartnership who shall have paid such tax or annual license of $500 may advertise and put forth signs having thereon, after the name of such person, firm, or copartnership, the words "private banker" or "private bankers," as the case may be.

Mr. GALLINGER. That amendment and the other one suggested in the report should be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. KEAN. Yes; they should appear in the bill.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to say, Mr. President, that I am at a loss to understand the scope of the provisions of this bill from the mere reading of it, and I should be glad to have some member of the committee that has reported the bill explain its object and purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] reported the bill. He is not in the Chamber at present, and I suggest that the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from New Hampshire.

CONDEMNATION OF LANDS FOR PUBLIC PURPOSES.

The bill (S. 6626) providing for the condemnation for any public purpose of lands owned or held by the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEAN. This bill seems to relate to some big scheme. I think it ought to go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

PAROLE OF UNITED STATES PRISONERS.

The bill (S. 4027) to parole United States prisoners, and for other purposes, was announced as the next business in order on the calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was considered by the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, on January 6 last. The committee amendments were all agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be reprinted.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be acted upon now.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELECTRIC LIGHT AND POWER IN LAHAINA, HAWAII.

The bill (S. 7697) to ratify an act of the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii authorizing the manufacture and distribution of electric light and power in the district of Lahaina, Territory of Hawaii, was announced as the next business in order on the calendar.

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

ELECTRIC LIGHT AND POWER IN WAILUKU, HAWAII.

The bill (S. 7698) to ratify and confirm an act of the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, authorizing the manufacture and distribution of electric light and power in the district of Wailuku, Territory of Hawaii, was announced as the next business in order on the calendar.

Mr. KEAN. Let this bill go over, also.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

WILLIAM T. ROSSELL, JR., AND HARRY G. WEAVER.

The bill (S. 7486) authorizing the President to reinstate William T. Rossell, jr., and Harry G. Weaver as cadets in the United States Military Academy was announced as the next business in order on the calendar.

Mr. DICK. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from Ohio.

CHEYENNE RIVER AND STANDING ROCK RESERVATIONS.

The bill (S. 7914) to amend sections 7 and 8 of the act of May 29, 1908 (35 Stat. L., p. 460), entitled "An act to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian reservations, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect," was announced as the next business in order on the calendar, and was read.

Mr. KEAN. I think the appropriation of $415,000 should be postponed. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

ALLOTMENT OF INDIAN LANDS IN SEVERALTY.

The bill (S. 7916) to amend an act approved May 8, 1906, entitled "An act to amend section 6 of an act approved February 8, 1887, entitled 'An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes,'" was announced as the next business in order on the calendar.

Mr. CARTER. The bill relates to a subject which has been very vigorously debated upon this floor from time to time. It seems to be a very important bill. It is appropriate, I think, for some member of the committee conversant with the change of law and the purpose to be subserved to make an explanation of the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator in charge of the bill does not seem to be in the Chamber this mornuing, and I suggest that the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from Rhode Island.

COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL PEACE.

The bill (S. 6272) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish the Foundation for the Promotion of Industrial Peace," was announced as the next business in order on the calendar.

Mr. KEAN. May I ask a question? Did we not the other day pass a bill very similar to this, on the request of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The title has a familiar sound.

Mr. KEAN. Then I think this bill had better go over. I think the Senator from Virginia had such a bill passed. Let it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair can not answer the Senator from New Jersey definitely. The bill will go over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

APPEALS FROM COURT OF CLAIMS.

The bill (S. 8245) to authorize appeals to be taken from the judgments of the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States in certain cases now pending before the Court of Claims, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments. The first amendment was, on page 2, line 1, after the word "eighteen," to strike out:

Robert V. Belt and Joseph P. Mullen v. The Chickasaw Freedmen, No. 30192; Robert V. Belt and Joseph P. Mullen v. The Choctaw Freedmen, No. 30193.

So as to make the section read:

That either party to the cases hereinafter mentioned now pending before the Court of Claims may, within sixty days from the filing of any judgment by said court, appeal therefrom to the Supreme Court of the United States, to wit: Estate of Charles F. Winton, deceased, et al. v. Jack Amos et al., known as the Mississippi Choctaws, No. 29821; S. W. Peel v. The Choctaw Nation and The United States, No. 30018; Marion Westcott v. The Menominee Tribe of Indians of Wisconsin, No. 30178; F. F. Green v. The Menominee Tribe of Indians of Wisconsin, No. 30179; J. A. Liege v. The Menominee Tribe of Indians of Wisconsin, No. 30180; Heirs of Samuel Garland v. The Choctaw Nation, No. 30252; and also the case authorized by the act of June 21, 1906 (34 Stat. L., p. 325), to be brought by the heirs of Peter Pitchlynn against the Choctaw Nation, should said suit hereafter be instituted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That that part of section 27 of the act of May 29, 1908 (35 Stat. L., p. 444), as follows: "That the lands allotted to said Mississippi Choctaws are hereby declared subject to a lien to the extent of the claims of the said Winton and of the other plaintiffs authorized by Congress to sue the said defendants, subject to the final judgment of the Court of Claims in said case;" and that part of section 16 of said act providing that "the same to be a lien against their respective allotments of land for their pro rata amounts thereof;" and that the following provision of the act approved April 30, 1908 (35 Stat. L., p. 90), "and such contracts as are approved as herein provided, when recorded in the county where such land is located, shall be a lien, in the event of the restoration of such persons to the rolls, against allotted lands or tribal funds of the person so restored to or given rights upon said rolls," be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. Let us have the report read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. DIXON on the 22d day of January, 1909, which is as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 8245) entitled "A bill to authorize appeals to be taken from the judgments of the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States in certain cases now pending before the Court of Claims, and for other purposes," having examined the same, recommend that it be amended by striking out all of line 12, on page 1, and lines 1, 2, 3, and line 4 to and including the words "ninety-three," and that all of section 2 be stricken out, and as so amended the committee report said bill favorably and recommend its passage.

In support of the foregoing report the committee beg leave to refer to the attached letter of the Secretary of the Interior. The committee has amended the bill by striking out the reference to cases Nos. 30192 and 30193, because the acts authorizing said suits provide in themselves for an appeal to the Supreme Court, and the committee has recommended striking out section 2, because the acts authorizing the actions provide for liens, and the committee believe it would be unfair to the attorneys who have and are prosecuting these actions, and who have already incurred a great deal of labor and expense, to deprive them now of their liens.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 19, 1908.

SIR: There is inclosed a draft of bill authorizing appeals in certain cases to the Supreme Court of the United States from the judgments or decrees of the Court of Claims.

By section 9 of the act of April 26, 1906 (34 Stat. L., 137), Charles F. Winton, deceased, "his associates and assigns," were authorized to bring suit in the Court of Claims "for services rendered and expenses incurred in the matter of the claims of the Mississippi-Choctaws for citizenship in the Choctaw Nation," and the court was authorized to render judgment on the principle of quantum meruit.

By section 17 of the act of May 29, 1908 (35 Stat. L., 444), William M. Vernon, J. S. Bounds, and Chester Howe, "their associates and assigns," were authorized to interplead in the Winton suit, and the department understands that J. E. Arnold and Joseph W. Gillett have also intervened in said suit, although the law does not specifically authorize them to do so. It is understood that they claim to have been associates of Charles F. Winton, deceased.

Section 16 of the act of May 29, 1908 (35 Stat. L., 444), authorized Robert V. Belt, of this city, and Joseph P. Mullen, of Ardmore, Okla., to bring suit against the Choctaw and Chickasaw freedmen "for services rendered and expenses incurred by them as attorneys" in prosecuting the claims of the freedmen for allotments of land within the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations; and by section 2 of the same act M. (Marion) Westcott and other traders mentioned therein were authorized to bring suit against the Menominee tribe of Indians of Wisconsin and certain members thereof "for supplies, goods, wares, merchandise, tools, and live stock furnished certain members of said tribe" after January 1, 1898.

By the act of February 18, 1907 (34 Stat. L., vol. 2, p. 2415), S. W. Peel, of Bentonville, Ark., was given the right to bring suit against the Choctaw Nation "for services rendered and expenditures had" in an action in the Court of Claims, wherein Yvon Pike, Lillian Pike, and Yvon Pike as the administrator of the estate of Luther S. Pike, deceased, were plaintiffs, and the Choctaw Nation was defendant.

Section 5 of the act of May 29, 1908 (35 Stat. L., 444), "authorized and directed" the Court of Claims to hear and adjudicate the claims "against the Choctaw Nation of Samuel Garland, deceased, and to render judgment thereon in such amounts, if any, as may appear to be equitably due."

The act of June 21, 1906 (34 Stat. L., 325), authorized and directed the Court of Claims to hear and adjudicate the claims against the Choctaw Nation "of the heirs of Peter Pitchlynn, deceased, and to render judgment thereon."

It is a well-settled principle that an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States, in a case of the character of any of those mentioned herein, will not lie unless the jurisdictional act authorizes an appeal to be taken (ex parte Warmouth, 17 Wall., 64, and ex parte Atocha, 17 Wall., 439). This doctrine was upheld by the Supreme Court at its present term in the case of the United States and the Cherokee Nation v. John J. Hemphill and Kenneth S. Murchison, case No. 529.

None of these acts provide for an appeal by either party to the Supreme Court of the United States. Many of the cases involve large amounts and are of great importance to the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations and also to the Menominee tribe of Indians. Usually in such cases Congress provides for an appeal by either party to the Supreme Court from the judgment or decree of the Court of Claims, and in the opinion of this department cases of the magnitude of some of these should not stop short of the highest court in the land. The claims against the Menominee tribe and certain individual members thereof are for supplies furnished such individual members in connection with logging operations. The supplies were not furnished to the tribe, and it is believed that should the Court of Claims render judgment against the tribe for supplies furnished individual members thereof such judgment should not be paid unless affirmed by the Supreme Court.

Although the Indian Office and the department recommended the enactment of that part of the act of April 30, 1908, making the contracts between attorneys and persons whose names were stricken from the rolls of the Five Civilized Tribes a lien on the land of such persons in the event their names are restored to the rolls, the department and the Indian Office have reached the conclusion that said provision is unjust and inequitable and should be repealed.

The same is true of similar provisions contained in sections 16 and 27 of the act of May 29, 1908, making the claims of Winton et al. and of Belt and Mullen a lien on the lands of the Mississippi Choctaws and Choctaw and Chickasaw freedmen, respectively. The lands of these people should not be burdened with a lien before judgment is rendered against them, and such legislation is unusual.

I urgently request that you cause the draft of bill inclosed to be introduced and that Congress enact it into law.

Very respectfully,

JAMES RUDOLPH GARFIELD,
Secretary.

Hon. MOSES E. CLAPP,
Chairman Senate Committee on Indian Affairs,
Washington, D. C.

During the reading of the report,

Mr. DIXON. Unless the Senator from New Jersey is especially desirous of hearing the entire report read, I should like to make a suggestion.

Mr. KEAN. I was trying to find out what is the object of the appeal to the Supreme Court. I see what it is now. It is to pay certain attorneys' fees, and therefore I ask that the bill may go over.

Mr. DIXON. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that the bill was prepared especially at the request of the Secretary of the Interior. I think if the Senator from New Jersey understood its full import he would not object to it.

There are several suits pending against certain Indian tribes which were referred to the Court of Claims and no appeal to the Supreme Court provided for. The Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs are very much of the opinion that these claims should not be paid, and the Secretary asks that in the event of an adverse judgment in the Court of Claims he be permitted to take an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States before he is compelled to pay over the money.

Mr. KEAN. Do I understand that these cases have been tried in the Court of Claims?

Mr. DIXON. They are now pending, and on account of the large amount involved and for fear of an adverse judgment the Secretary and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs are very anxious that the Government should be permitted to take an appeal in such an event.

Mr. KEAN. I may be very dull of comprehension, but the way I read the first part of the report it sounded to me as if it were a means of increasing attorneys' fees.

Mr. DIXON. No; it is to enable the Government to appeal these cases in the event of an adverse judgment.

Mr. KEAN. I am very strongly in favor of that kind of action, but I thought attorneys' fees had been allowed, and they thought they were a little too small and wanted to get a little more money.

Mr. DIXON. No. It was prepared by the Secretary and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and was transmitted at their request. I do not speak of the merits of the cases.

Mr. KEAN. I withdraw the objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey withdraws his objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WARREN C. BEACH.

The bill (S. 4029) to appoint Warren C. Beach a captain in the army and place him on the retired list was announced as the next business in order on the calendar.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from South Dakota.

ALASKA SHORT LINE RAILROAD.

The bill (S. 7781) to extend the time for the construction and beginning construction of the Alaska Short Line Railroad in Alaska, was announced as the next business in order on the calendar.

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

JOHN W. SAVILLE.

The bill (S. 3836) placing John W. Saville, passed assistant engineer, United States Navy, on the retired list with an advanced rank was considered as the next business in order on the calendar, and was read.

Mr. LODGE. Let the report be read. I should like to have time to look at the bill. It has some very unusual provisions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read, at the request of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. DICK on the 1st instant, which is as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3836) placing John W. Saville on the retired list of the navy with an advanced rank, having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

Passed Asst. Engineer John W. Saville, U. S. Navy, retired, excluded from participating in the benefits conferred on officers with creditable civil war service by the act of June 29, 1906, because of the proviso to that act "that this act shall not apply to any officer who received an advance of grade at or since the date of his retirement."

Mr. Saville did receive an advance of one grade—from assistant to passed assistant engineer—some time after the date of his retirement, namely, in 1884, by special act of Congress, but it appears that the advance in question was one to which he had become entitled before his retirement by reason of his length of service in the grade of assistant engineer, and an advance he would have received before retirement if he had been accorded his examination for promotion at the time when he became entitled to take it by law and navy regulations, to wit, in 1868.

On January 1, 1868, Mr. Saville was entitled to examination for promotion to passed assistant engineer and was at the time qualified, physically and otherwise, it appears, to pass it. He was, however, on duty on the Asiatic Station and it was not deemed advisable for the good of the service to detach him and send him home to stand the examination. After being detained in Asiatic waters until July 24, 1869, eighteen months beyond the time for his examination, he lost his health on account of arduous duties performed on board ship, was condemned by the medical survey, ordered home, and retired in 1871. His physical disability, incurred as the direct result of actual service in exceptional and trying duty, and incurred after the time set for his examination, prevented this officer from receiving the advance to passed assistant engineer before he retired.

Consequently, his advance by special act after retirement was one to which he had long before been entitled to receive and was not a promotion for creditable civil-war service. If Mr. Saville had been allowed to stand his examination at the time (1868) when his length of service as assistant engineer qualified him to do so, he would most probably have been advanced to passed assistant engineer prior to his retirement and would now be eligible for promotion under the act of June 29, 1906. Believing this, your committee is of the opinion that Passed Assistant Engineer Saville should receive the advance of one grade accorded by the act of June 29, 1906, for creditable civil-war service, and recommends the passage of this bill.

During the reading of the report,

Mr. LODGE. I do not ask for the further reading. Let the bill go over.

Mr. DICK. Does the Senator insist upon his objection?

Mr. LODGE. I have read the report, and I do not feel, after reading it, that this is a proper case for such action. Moreover, it takes the very unusual course of dating back the pay, which is carefully excluded from such bills ordinarily.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice at the request of the Senator from Massachusetts.

WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. KNOX. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 26068) providing for an additional judge for the western district of Pennsylvania, and for other purposes, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 1060) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRANT OF LAND TO ALVA, OKLA.

The bill (S. 7226) granting certain land in the city of Alva, Okla., used for land-office purposes by the Government, to the city of Alva, Okla., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in line 9, to strike out all after the word "Oklahoma," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the acre of ground hertofore reserved by the United States for the location of a land office, together with the building located upon lot No. 1, block No. 40, of the plat of the town site of Alva, approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office on September 14, 1893, is hereby dedicated and conveyed to the city of Alva, Okla.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF INTOXICATING DRINKS TO INDIANS.

The bill (S. 8553) to amend section 1 of an act approved January 30, 1897, entitled "An act to prohibit the sale of intoxicating drinks to Indians, providing penalties therefor, and for other purposes," was announced as the next business in order on the calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from Rhode Island.

STANDING AND SELECT COMMITTEES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. ALDRICH. I offer a privileged resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 294) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the standing and select committees of the Senate, as constituted at the end of this session, be, and they are hereby, continued until the next regular session of Congress or until their successors are elected.

FUNGICIDES AND INSECTICIDES.

The bill (S. 6515) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded fungicides, Paris greens, lead arsenates, and other insecticides, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes, was announced as the next business in order on the calendar.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I promised the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO] that I would not ask to have the bill taken up in his absence. The Senator from Florida is unavoidably detained from the Chamber. Therefore I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from South Dakota.

CAPT. JOHN C. WILSON.

The bill (S. 4229) for the relief of Capt. John C. Wilson, U. S. Navy, retired, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President to advance Capt. John C. Wilson, U. S. Navy, retired, on the retired list of the navy, to the grade of commodore on the retired list with the rank he would have occupied in such grade had he been retired June 30, 1907, under the provisions of the navy personnel act of March 3, 1899.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PINE RIDGE INDIAN RESERVATION, S. DAK.

The bill (S. 7380) to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect, was announced as the next business in order on the calendar.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Let the bill go over. I ask that a portion of the report, being a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask that the whole report be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will go over without prejudice, at the request of the junior Senator from South Dakota, and the entire report will be printed in the RECORD without being read, at the request of the senior Senator from South Dakota.

The report submitted by Mr. GAMBLE from the Committee on Indian Affairs on the 4th instant is as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 7380) to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in the State of South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report that said bill do pass with the following amendments:

On page 7, line 24, strike out the words "one dollar and twenty-five" and insert in lieu thereof the words "two dollars and fifty."

On page 8, line 13, strike out the word "sixty-five" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one hundred and thirty."

The present area of the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation aggregates about 2,765,000 acres. The lands proposed to be opened to settlement under the provisions of this bill will embrace an area of about 900,000 acres. It is the understanding of the committee that a majority of allotments to the adult Indians on this reservation have been made. Provision has been made under recent statutes for the allotment of all the minor children on the reservation. This work is now in progress and it is expected it can be completed on the lands proposed to be opened during the present year.

The provisions of the bill are substantially the same as the one passed during the last session of Congress for the opening of about 3,000,000 acres on the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian reservations, in the States of North and South Dakota. In that case the bill in question was submitted to the Indians upon those reservations prior to its passage, and with slight modifications was approved by them. It was at first contemplated to submit this bill, through an Indian inspector, for the consideration of the Pine Ridge Indians, but the inspector, who for a number of years has had that especial work in charge, is otherwise occupied and has been unable to take it up, and it is felt by the committee that the provisions of the bill are fair and just to the Indians in all respects, and it would delay the consideration of the matter unduly if action were withheld for that purpose, and the measure could not receive consideration during the present session of Congress.

The reservation is large, and in the judgment of your committee the surplus and unallotted lands are unnecessary for the use of the Indians, and the opening of the reservation would result in a large increase in the settlement and the development of that part of the State and would enhance to a very large extent the value of the holdings of the Indians. Your committee regard it of the highest importance, not only to the Indians themselves, but to the people of the State and of the General Government, that all surplus lands should be opened to settlement at the earliest practicable date.

The bill provides that prior to the issuance of the proclamation for the opening of the lands to settlement the Secretary of the Interior shall cause allotments to be made to all Indians and minors belonging to or holding tribal relations with the Indians upon the reservation who have not heretofore been allotted. It also provides that the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, may permit Indians who have an allotment within the area proposed to be opened to relinquish such allotments and to receive in lieu thereof allotments anywhere within the reservation proposed to be diminished.

Sections 16 and 36 of the lands in each township are not to be disposed of, but are reserved for the use of the common schools of the State, and these lands are to be paid for by the Government in conformity with the provisions of the act admitting the State of South Dakota into the Union. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to reserve such lands as are necessary for agency, school, and religious purposes in conformity with the practice of the Government in measures of this character.

The lands to be opened are to be inspected, appraised, and valued by a commission for that purpose appointed by the President of the United States, which appraisement is subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. The lands to be opened are reserved for homesteads, and one-fifth of the price so fixed for the land is to be paid upon entry thereof and the balance in five equal annual installments. The Secretary of the Interior is also authorized to reserve from said lands such tracts for town-site purposes as in his opinion may be required for the future public interests, and the moneys realized from the sale thereof are to be applied to the benefit of the tribe. The moneys derived from the sale of the lands are to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indians of the tribe, and the same shall draw interest at 3 per cent per annum, and these moneys shall be expended for the benefit of the tribe under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The communications from the Secretary of the Interior reporting upon the bill are herewith submitted and made a part of this report:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 26, 1909.

SIR: The department is in receipt of your letter of December 15, 1908, transmitting a copy of Senate bill No. 7380, authorizing the sale and disposition of the surplus unallotted lands on a part of the Pine Ridge Reservation, S. Dak.

In response your attention is invited to a letter from this department, under even date herewith, addressed to you, regarding Senate bill No. 7379, authorizing the sale and disposition of the surplus unallotted lands on a part of the Rosebud Reservation. The suggestions made therein apply with equal force to Senate bill No. 7380, and if the committee and the Congress agree with Senator GAMBLE and the department that the views of the Indians should be procured before final action is had on this bill, then it would be advisable to delay such action until the next session of the Congress.

Again, the allotting work on this reservation has not been completed, and owing to the number of Indians yet to be allotted the department does not believe that any part of this reservation can be opened prior to the year 1910, in view of which it is not seen wherein any material advantage will be gained by pressing the matter at this session of the Congress.

Should action be taken at this session, however, it is respectfully recommended that the bill be amended by striking out the words "one dollar and twenty-five cents," in section 7, page 7, line 24, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "two dollars and fifty cents;" and that section 8, page 8, line 13, be amended by striking out the word "sixty-five" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one hundred and thirty," the reasons therefor being the same as those suggested to you in the letter of even date herewith regarding the opening of a part of the Rosebud Reservation.

Very respectfully,

JAMES RUDOLPH GARFIELD,
Secretary.

Hon. MOSES E. CLAPP, United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 26, 1909.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of December 12, 1908, transmitting for recommendation and report a copy of Senate bill No. 7380, authorizing the sale and disposition of the surplus unallotted lands on a part of the Pine Ridge Reservation, S. Dak.

In response, your attention is invited to a letter of even date herewith, addressed to you, regarding Senate bill No. 7379, authorizing the sale and disposition of the surplus lands on a part of the Rosebud Reservation. The suggestions in the letter referred to apply with equal force to Senate bill No. 7380.

If you still think that the views of the Indians should be procured before action is taken on this bill, then it would be advisable to delay such action until the next session of the Congress. Again, the allotting work on this reservation has not been completed, and as this work must be finished before the surplus unallotted lands can be classified and appraised, it is not believed that any part of this reservation can be opened prior to the year 1910; in view of which it is not seen wherein any material advantage will be gained by pressing the matter at this session of the Congress.

Should action be taken at this or subsequent sessions, however, it is respectfully recommended that the bill be amended by striking out the words "one dollar and twenty-five cents" in section 7, page 7, line 24, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "two dollars and fifty cents," and that section 8, page 8, line 13, be amended by striking out the word "sixty-five" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one hundred and thirty," for the same reasons as those given in the other communication from this department addressed to you regarding the opening of the surplus lands on the Rosebud Reservation.

Very respectfully,

JAMES RUDOLPH GARFIELD,
Secretary.

Hon. ROBERT J. GAMBLE,
United States Senate.

The letter of the Secretary of the Interior, referred to in the foregoing communication, is also submitted and made a part of this report:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 26, 1909.

SIR: The department has received your letter of December 12, 1908, transmitting for recommendation and report a copy of Senate bill 7379, authorizing the sale and disposition of the surplus unallotted lands on a part of the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota. You suggest that Inspector James McLaughlin be detailed for the purpose of bringing the provisions of the bill to the attention of the Indians with a view of procuring an expression of their views regarding the opening of that part of the reservation described in the bill.

In response you are informed that the department recognizes the fact that Congress can enact legislation of this character without the consent of the Indians interested, but agrees with you that the views of the Indians should be procured before the bill is finally acted on, as it facilitates the work of allotment if the Indians of the tribe have the provisions of the bill explained to them in advance and are given an opportunity to suggest amendments which, if deemed reasonable, Congress may be glad to adopt.

It agrees with you that Inspector McLaughlin, owing to his long experience with the Sioux Indians, is the most satisfactory person to bring this matter to the attention of the members of the Rosebud tribe, and it is believed that he can do more with these Indians in the way of discussing the provisions of the pending bill than any other man now connected with the service.

Mr. McLaughlin, however, has been detailed recently to the work of supervising the distribution of over $698,000 among some 4,440 beneficiaries under a recent judgment of the Court of Claims, payment for which was authorized by the act of May 30, 1908. (35 Stat. L., 514.) These beneficiaries are scattered throughout several States, and it will take three or four months, if not longer, to complete this work. Mr. McLaughlin's acquaintance with these Indians makes his services in connection with this payment almost indispensable, but while he is engaged therein an excellent opportunity will be given him to confer with the Indians of the Rosebud tribe regarding the intention of Congress to open a part of their reservation at an early date, thereby paving the way for ultimately procuring promptly the views of the Indians regarding the provisions of the pending bill.

The Rosebud Reservation has been reduced very rapidly during the last few years, and intimations have reached this department from trustworthy sources that there is danger that the land available for allotment may be exhausted if too large a reduction is made at this time. I do not believe, therefore, that the strip of land on the east of the present diminished reservation should be opened yet; but should the Congress take action at this session, it is respectfully recommended that the bill be amended by striking out the description of the part of the reservation to be opened (pp. 1 and 2) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Commencing at a point on the tenth standard parallel of latitude north where it is intersected by the western boundary of the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota; thence north along said boundary line to a point in the center of the main channel of the White River; thence easterly along the center of the main channel of the said White River to a point where the range line 25 west of the sixth principal meridian intersects the same; thence south on said range line 25 west of the sixth principal meridian to a point where it is intersected by the tenth standard parallel of latitude north; thence west along said parallel to the place of beginning."

Whether action is had on the pending bill at this or subsequent sessions of the Congress, it is recommended further that the bill be amended by striking out the words "one dollar and twenty-five cents," in section 7, page 8, line 2, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "two dollars and fifty cents;" and that section 8, page 8, line 16, be amended by striking out the word "sixty-five" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one hundred and thirty."

In connection with the foregoing, attention is invited to the fact that prior to the passage of the act of May 29, 1908 (35 Stat. L., 460), Inspector McLaughlin was sent to the Standing Rock and Cheyenne River reservations for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the Indians the provisions of the bill then pending to open the parts of the reservation named. At a meeting of the Indians of both of the tribes named it was informally agreed that $2.50 per acre would be paid them for all lands granted the States of North and South Dakota for school purposes. As originally passed by the Senate the bill then pending (S. 1385, 60th Cong., 1st sess.) did provide for the payment of these lands at the rate of $2.50 per acre, but as passed in the House the price was reduced to $2 per acre; but when the bill came from conference and as finally passed it provided for the payment of these lands at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

On being informed of the provisions of the act of May 29, 1908, supra, the Indians of both reservations expressed themselves as being very much dissatisfied and disappointed, believing that the Government had not exercised good faith in dealing with them in this matter, inasmuch as in their opinion they should have received $2.50 per acre for their land, and, as appeared from the above facts, this was the belief also of a large number of Members of Congress who had given the matter careful attention.

It is believed, therefore, that the Congress can not only well afford but would desire, with all these facts before it, to arrange to pay the Indians for all lands granted the State of South Dakota for school purposes at the rate of $2.50 per acre.

Very respectfully,

JAMES RUDOLPH GARFIELD,
Secretary.

Hon. ROBERT J. GAMBLE,
United States Senate.

RETURN OF BOOKS TO LIBRARIES.

The bill (S. 7298) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole February 15 last, and the committee amendment agreed to.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT POLICE AND FIREMEN'S RELIEF FUND.

The bill (S. 8276) for the creation of the police and firemen's relief fund, to provide for the retirement of members of the police and fire departments, to establish a method of procedure for such retirement, and for other purposes, was announced as the next business in order on the calendar, and the Secretary proceeded to read it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That seems to be a very comprehensive bill; the Senator who reported it is not in the Chamber, and I ask that it may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from Connecticut.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 26915) making appropriations for the support of the army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, that the request of the House for a conference be granted, and that the President of the Senate shall appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice-President appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. FORAKER, and Mr. TALIAFERRO conferees on the part of the Senate.

GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which was read:

IN THE HOUSE,
February 15, 1909.

House concurrent resolution 68.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate be, and hereby are, authorized to cancel their signatures to the enrolled bill H. R. 25155, "An act to amend an act approved July 1, 1902, entitled 'An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes,'" and that the said bill be reenrolled with the insertion of the words "third paragraph of the" after the words "That the," in the first line after the enacting words of said bill.

Mr. LODGE. I have examined the matter. I ask that the resolution be concurred in.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

JUVENILE COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next bill on the calendar will be announced.

The bill (S. 8518) empowering the juvenile court of the District of Columbia to issue execution on forfeited recognizances was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIANS OF FORT BERTHOLD RESERVATION.

The bill (S. 8918) to provide for the payment to certain Indians of Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, in North Dakota, for certain horses condemned and destroyed by the Bureau of Animal Industry in the years 1906 and 1907, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $13,860, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay such Indians of Fort Berthold Reservation, in the State of North Dakota, as the Secretary of the Interior shall determine to be entitled thereto the value of certain horses condemned and destroyed by the Bureau of Animal Industry in the years 1906 and 1907, the value of the horses to be ascertained and determined by the Secretary of the Interior.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A. R. HOLZHEID.

The bill (S. 706) for the relief of A. R. Holzheid, who sustained loss of property in the San Francisco fire of April, 1906, was read.

Mr. KEAN. Let the report be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. KEAN. I think this is a case where there was some insurance recovered.

Mr. WARREN. This is a case where the chief clerk of the Department of California, instead of taking care of his own personal property, went with General Funston to take care of the sufferers in the earthquake and the fire. He is neither an enlisted man nor a commissioned officer, and therefore has no recourse except to Congress, whereas if he had been an enlisted man or an officer he could have collected the amount of his loss under the provisions of the general law.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming if this is not a bill which should properly have been sent to the Committee on Claims

Mr. WARREN. I hardly think so, because the appeal was made by General Funston on account of the peculiar law relating to military affairs. For instance, an enlisted man would, of course, have recourse directly to the department; the department would have had a board of survey and made the return and paid the amount without expecting Congress to appropriate for the payment.

There is only one ground on which it should go to the Committee on Claims. Of course every claim for money might properly go to the Committee on Claims, but that rule has never been enforced. We passed the other day three bills of exactly the same character as this coming from other committees. We have passed such bills coming from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and various other committees.

If in the next Congress the chairman of the Committee on Claims and others will approve the stand that every one of the calls upon the Government for money shall go to the Committee on Claims, I shall not resist it, but I would not like to have that rule applied to this particular bill, under all the circumstances.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say that, as far as I am personally concerned, I believe that any claim of this character coming to Congress ought to go to the Committee on Claims and that committee should pass upon it. We have claims similar to this one before the committee. I think this bill ought to have been passed on by the Committee on Claims rather than the Committee on Military Affairs.

I will not object any further to the passage of the bill.

Mr. KEAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Wyoming to the letter from headquarters, Department of California, in the report. I ask the Secretary to read that part of the report in which the amount is reduced from $1,400——

Mr. WARREN. From $1,400 to ten hundred and some dollars.

Mr. KEAN. To $412.50.

Mr. WARREN. I say that it was reduced to ten hundred and something, and that is what the bill calls for.

Mr. KEAN. But in the report the amount is reduced to $412.50.

Mr. WARREN. I do not care to have a part of the report read unless all of it is read. The matter has had careful consideration by the Committee on Military Affairs. If the Senate presumes that that committee is incapable of passing upon it, let the bill go over. It is a matter, however, that is very dear to the heart of General Funston and others, who were so efficient in saving life and property after the earthquake at San Francisco. I think we all know that General Funston, together with his associates, even without definite law, rules, and regulations, performed one of the greatest deeds that any American ever did when he took his army and went to the rescue of the sufferers in the earthquake and the fire which followed it. This man, who was directly under the General's orders, neglected his own property, which might have been saved if he had remained in his home, but he went out and assisted in the saving of life and property for others. If the Senate believes that he ought to lose all his private effects in the meantime, it will say so.

Mr. KEAN. That is not the question here at all. If the Senator from Wyoming wishes to reward this individual for his services, I am not questioning that, but it is proposed to pay him for clothing that was lost, and, as I read it, the department says that he is entitled to $412.50. That is what the department says.

Mr. WARREN. As I said before, if there is any question about it, either let the whole report be read or let the bill go over, if the Senator insists on it.

Mr. KEAN. Let it go over then.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say, if I may be permitted, that this is the first bill of this character that has been halted, upon the idea that it should go to the Committee on Claims. It is the most deserving of all the bills of this character, and we have passed probably nearly a hundred. On this particular man at this particular time, under the particular circumstances, I consider it in bad grace, if not in bad faith.

Mr. SMOOT. As far as the objections I offered are concerned, I did not offer them on that ground. I did it upon the ground that perhaps it would be better to investigate and find out just what amount should be paid, in view of the sum stated in the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

ALASKA CENTRAL RAILWAY.

The bill (H. R. 27068) to extend the time for the completion of the Alaska Central Railway, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

SPECIAL PEACE OFFICERS IN ALASKA.

The bill (S. 8058) authorizing the Attorney-General to appoint as special peace officers such employees of the Alaska school service as may be named by the Secretary of the Interior was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KEAN. The last provision in the bill is rather a queer one.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to strike out the last proviso, beginning in line 8, in the following words:

Provided, however, That no person so appointed shall be entitled to any fees or emoluments of any character whatsoever for performing any of the services herein mentioned, but may be allowed, in the discretion of the Attorney-General, expenses actually and necessarily incurred in connection with such services.

It is manifestly inconsistent with itself.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6484) to establish postal savings banks for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEAN. I ask the Senator from Montana to yield to me. I merely want to have a bill indefinitely postponed.

Mr. CARTER. I yield for that purpose.

INDUSTRIAL PEACE COMMITTEE.

Mr. KEAN. When on the calendar, a little while ago, we reached the bill (S. 6272) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish the Foundation for the Promotion of Industrial Peace." I ask that it be indefinitely postponed, a similar bill having passed and become a law on the 18th day of February. It is the same bill with a change of only four words, the words "said committee to consist." That is the only change in the bill as it became a law. I move that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. I yield for a moment to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR UTAH.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill (S. 9198) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish two condemned brass or bronze field guns, carriages, and cannon balls to the State of Utah.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM].

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR COLORADO.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 9286) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish two condemned brass or bronze field guns, carriages, and cannon balls to the State of Colorado.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 27523) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, to report it favorably with sundry amendments, and I submit a report (No. 1062) thereon. I shall ask the Senate in the morning, after the routine morning business, to take up the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6484) to establish postal savings banks for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that a vote be taken on the pending bill and all amendments then pending or to be offered at 4 o'clock on the 24th.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana asks that a final vote be taken upon the pending bill and pending amendments and amendments to be offered at 4 o'clock on the 24th instant.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am constrained to object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CARTER. I now offer the amendment to the bill which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That there be, and is hereby, established a system of postal savings depositories under the supervision and direction of a board of trustees; which board shall consist of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General, acting ex officio, and two members appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, each for the term of five years; and each of said two members shall receive a salary of $10,000 per annum, and shall hold no other office of trust or profit under the United States while serving under such appointment. All regulations for the receipt, transmission, custody, investment, and repayment of moneys deposited at postal savings depositories shall be prescribed by the board of trustees herein established. It shall be the duty of said board to report to Congress at its next session a plan for the simple and economical administration of the business of said system; and any regulation prescribed by the Postmaster-General under authority of this act shall be subject to the approval of said board. Said board shall report to Congress at the beginning of each regular session their transactions under the provisions of this act, including a statement showing the number of post-offices receiving deposits of postal savings in each State and Territory, the aggregate amount of deposits made therein, the aggregate of withdrawals therefrom, the amount of interest paid to depositors, and the amount of extra expense incident to the system of postal savings, and all other facts which they may deem pertinent and proper to present.

SEC. 2. That each and every post-office within the United States which is authorized to issue money orders, and such others as the Postmaster-General in his discretion may from time to time designate, are hereby declared to be postal savings depository offices to receive deposits from the public and to account for and dispose of the same according to this act. Every postal savings depository office shall be kept open for the transaction of business every day (Sundays and legal holidays excepted) during the usual post-office business hours of the town or locality where such depository is located, and between such additional specific hours as the Postmaster-General may direct: Provided, That the Postmaster-General may, if he deems it necessary or more practical, establish at first postal savings depositories only at the money-order offices of the first, second, and third classes, and thereafter extend the system as rapidly as practicable to all other post-offices specified above.

SEC. 3. That accounts may be opened and deposits made in any postal savings depository established under this act by any person of the age of 10 years or over in his or her own name, and by a married woman in her own name and free from any control or interference by her husband; but no person shall simultaneously have more than one postal savings account.

SEC. 4. That the postmaster at a postal savings depository shall, upon the making of an application to open an account under this act and the submission of an initial deposit, deliver to the depositor a pass book upon which shall be written the name and signature or mark of the depositor and such other memoranda as may be necessary for purposes of identification, in which pass book entries of all deposits shall be made: Provided, That the Postmaster-General may, with the approval of the board of trustees, adopt some other device in lieu of a pass book as a means of making and preserving evidence of deposits.

SEC. 5. That at least $1, or a larger amount in multiples thereof, must be deposited before an account is opened with the person depositing the same, and $1, or multiples thereof, may be deposited after such account has been opened, but no one shall be permitted to deposit more than $100 in any one calendar month: Provided, That in order that smaller amounts may be accumulated for deposit any person may purchase from any depository office for 10 cents a postal savings card to which may be attached specially prepared adhesive stamps, to be known as "postal savings stamps," and when the stamps so attached amount to $1, or a larger sum in multiples thereof, including the 10-cent postal saving card, the same may be presented as a deposit for opening an account, and additions may be made to any account by means of such card and stamps in amounts of $1, or multiples thereof, and when a card and stamps thereto attached are redeemed by any postmaster he shall immediately cancel the same. It is hereby made the duty of the Postmaster-General to prepare such postal savings cards and postal savings stamps of denominations of 10 cents, and to keep them on sale at every postal savings depository office, and to prescribe all necessary rules and regulations for the issue, sale, and cancellation thereof.

SEC. 6. That every deposit must be accompanied by the depositor's pass book, and at the time of the receipt of such deposit the postmaster shall enter in such book the amount thereof and the date of receipt, and shall return the same immediately to the depositor. The postmaster shall forthwith notify the Postmaster-General of such deposit and the amount thereof, and the latter shall cause to be forwarded to the depositor written acknowledgment of its receipt. If the depositor shall fail to receive such acknowledgment within such reasonable time as the Postmaster-General shall by regulation prescribe, he shall so notify the latter. The entry upon the pass book shall be conclusive evidence of the making of such deposit until the receipt by the depositor of such acknowledgment or until the expiration of the period prescribed within which the Postmaster-General shall be notified by the depositor of his failure to receive such acknowledgment. Upon the receipt of such acknowledgment it shall be conclusive evidence of the making of such deposit.

SEC. 7. That interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum shall be allowed and entered in the pass book to the credit of each depositor once in each year, the same to be computed on such basis and under such rules and regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe; but interest shall not be computed or allowed on any amount less than one dollar, or some multiple thereof: Provided, That the balance to the credit of any one person shall never be allowed to exceed $500, exclusive of accumulated interest.

SEC. 8. That every depositor shall forward his deposit pass book to the Postmaster-General in an envelope, free of postage, which will be furnished him at the postal savings depository office, once in each year, on or within thirty days after the anniversary of the first deposit made, for examination and entry of the amount of interest found due. In case a depositor shall lose his or her pass book he or she may secure a duplicate of the same upon application to the Postmaster-General, upon the payment of a charge to be fixed by him by general regulation, but in lieu of payment of cost of same it may be charged to the account of such depositor.

SEC. 9. That any depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of the funds deposited to his or her credit, with the accrued interest, after complying with such regulations as the board of trustees may prescribe. All withdrawals of deposits must be made in even dollars unless the account shall be closed, in which event the depositor's pass book shall be surrendered; and repayments to depositors shall be made under such regulations as the board of trustees may prescribe. No bank in which postal savings funds shall be deposited shall receive any exchange or any other fees or compensation on account of the cashing or collection of any checks or the performance of any other service in connection with the postal savings depository system.

SEC. 10. That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act and the regulations prescribed hereunder may be deposited in any solvent bank or banks in the neighborhood in which the funds are received at a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum, the board of trustees taking from such bank or banks such security for deposits so made as they shall deem necessary to insure the safety of the same; or such funds may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall be the treasurer of said board, and may be withdrawn from deposit upon their order for repayment to postal savings depositors; or for investment (first) in bonds or other securities of the United States, or (second) in bonds or other securities in which investment of the funds of savings banks is authorized by the law of the State or Territory in which such deposits were received: Provided, That postal savings funds deposited in any State in which no provision is made by law governing the investment of savings bank funds may be invested in the same character of securities in such State as are made the subject of investment of savings bank funds by the laws of the States of New York or California: Provided further, That said board of trustees shall maintain a reserve fund, either with the Treasurer of the United States or the banks as herein provided, not less in amount than 10 per cent of the total funds deposited in postal savings depositories. Interest and profits accruing from the deposit or investment of postal savings funds shall be applied to the payment of expenses of administration authorized by the board of trustees and approved by the Postmaster-General and of interest due to postal savings depositors as hereinbefore provided, and the excess thereof, if any, shall be covered into the Treasury as part of the postal revenues, or, in the discretion of the board of trustees, the same may be deposited in the Treasury as a reserve fund for the payment of deposits: Provided, That in the Treasury or with the Treasurer of the United States postal savings funds shall be designated and held as "trust funds," subject to disposition as provided in this act and not otherwise. For the purposes of this act the word "Territory" as used herein shall be held to include the District of Columbia, the district of Alaska, and Porto Rico.

SEC. 11. That postal savings depository funds shall be kept separate from other funds by postmasters and other officers and employees of the postal service, who shall be held to the same accountability under their bonds for such funds as for other public moneys; and no person connected with the Post-Office Department shall disclose to any person other than the depositor the amount of his or her deposit, unless directed so to do by the Postmaster-General. All statutes relating to the safe-keeping of and proper accounting for public moneys are made applicable to such funds, and the Postmaster-General may require postmasters, assistant postmasters, and clerks at postal savings depositories to give any additional bond he may deem necessary.

SEC. 12. That additional compensation shall be allowed postmasters at post-offices of the fourth class for the transaction of postal savings depository business. Such compensation shall be at the annual rate of one-fourth of 1 per cent of the deposits received at such postal savings depository, and shall be paid from the postal revenues; but postmasters, assistant postmasters, and clerks at post-offices of the presidential grade shall not receive any additional compensation for such service.

SEC. 13. That the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to enable the Postmaster-General and the board of trustees to establish a system of postal savings depositories in accordance with the provisions of this act; and the Postmaster-General is authorized to require postmasters and other postal officers and employees to transact in connection with their other postal duties such postal savings depository business as may be necessary, and he is also authorized to make, and with the approval of the board of trustees to promulgate, and from time to time to modify or revoke such rules and regulations not in conflict with law as he may deem necessary to carry the provisions of this act into effect.

SEC. 14. The postal savings depository funds are hereby declared to be public moneys, and all statutes relating to the embezzlement, conversion, and improper handling, retention, use, or disposal of postal and money-order funds and the punishments provided for such offenses are hereby extended and made applicable to postal savings depository funds, and all statutes relating to false returns of postal and money-order business, the forgery, counterfeiting, alteration, and other improper use or handling of postal and money-order blanks, forms, vouchers, accounts, and records, and the dies, plates, and engravings therefor, with the penalties provided in such statutes, are hereby extended and made applicable to false returns of postal savings depository business, and the forgery, counterfeiting, alteration, and other improper use or handling of postal savings depository blanks, forms, vouchers, accounts, and records, and the dies, plates, and engravings therefor.

SEC. 15. That this act shall take effect on the first day of the third calendar month after its approval.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I was about to recall the attention of the Senate to the fact that there are now pending certain amendments which I presented to the bill as originally reported by the committee. I desire that those amendments shall be disposed of before the consideration of the substitute just offered is entered upon. I understand that there are some Senators who desire to speak upon the amendments offered by myself. I have already given my views to the Senate with respect to those amendments.

It will be noticed by those who have taken the pains to read the substitute, or who have heard it read, that it is substantially a new bill. The whole scope of the original bill has been changed. First, it is provided that there shall be appointed two trustees, who are not now in office, at a salary of $10,000 each. I am very much opposed to that feature of the substitute. This does not seem to me to be the proper time to take on additional officers for the transaction of this business.

The latter part of the bill is wholly changed. It commits the money collected at the post-offices to these trustees, and they are given the option to either deposit the money in the solvent banks in the neighborhood or to deposit it in the Treasury of the United States, from which, if the latter course be pursued, it may be withdrawn for certain investments. This discretion, as I view the subject, and as I believe the people, certainly of the western country, will view the subject, introduces a feature again into the bill which will be almost universally condemned. It is simply another opportunity to collect the money from these various localities so that it will eventually find its way into the money centers and be entirely incapacitated to render the service to the people of our country that money ought to render.

If the bill were changed so that these savings should be invested in bonds of the United States, if bonds are to be provided for, I would have no objection to it. But I am sure that the experiment which is proposed by this substitute will result disastrously to the people of this country. Therefore, I desire, when the proper time comes, that the amendments which I propose be considered and determined by the Senate before the substitute is taken up.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, certain definite objections were urged to the bill as originally reported from the committee. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] objected directly to that portion of the bill which exempted the funds from garnishment and taxation, and likewise to that portion which provided for the deposit of the funds in national banks in the locality where the deposits were received, claiming, first, that the security exacted—that is, a prior lien on the resources of the bank—was objectionable; and, second, that the deposits should be made in banks organized under state laws, as well as under the national-bank law.

The amendment now being pressed by the Senator from Iowa is largely disposed of by the substitute, because it will be observed that the substitute does not in terms exempt the funds from garnishment, nor are the funds exempt from taxation as the property of the depositor. That leaves of the Senator's amendment only one question, and that involves deposits in state banks, and a supplemental question involving the security to be exacted from the banks in which deposits are made.

It is true that the substitute vests in a board of directors or trustees the authority previously vested in the Postmaster-General, or which was vested by the original bill. The committee has directed the report of this substitute for the measure previously reported.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CARTER. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would ask the Senator what service these two $10,000 men are to perform? It seems that once a year a report is to be made of certain doings which the Post-Office Department undoubtedly will have in hand, and yet we are to appoint, in addition to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General, two persons at a salary of $10,000 a year each.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney-General are now burdened with exacting official duties. They would be made, under this substitute, ex officio trustees of this fund, but, obviously, they could not give that close attention to the investment of the funds which both their importance and amount demand. The two additional officers would be the active officers connected with the investment of the funds. They would be undoubtedly constantly employed in making investments and would be expected to devote their entire time to the work.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CARTER. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have only read this amendment while it was being read by the Secretary in the Senate today. As I understand, speaking to the Senator who is in charge of the bill, section 10 in the former bill is practically eliminated by the substitute?

Mr. CARTER. It is practically eliminated by the substitute.

Mr. BORAH. But the substitute leaves the question of deposit in state banks yet in existence; that is to say, it does not provide for deposits exclusively in national banks?

Mr. CARTER. It provides for deposit in banks, but does not specify the kind of banks, leaving the board to determine as to the bank or banks and likewise as to the security for the return of the funds.

Mr. BORAH. What does the substitute do with reference to making the deposit a first lien upon the resources of the bank?

Mr. CARTER. Instead of thus providing for a first lien on the resources of the bank, the substitute bill provides that such security shall be taken by the board as the board may deem necessary for the safety of the funds. That is left wholly to the board.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, I will say, so far as my views of the matter are concerned, that those features of the old bill being eliminated, I would have no objection to the substitute except the question of creating these new officers. It was stated the other day in the discussion of this matter that the postal savings bank bill would incur but very little extra labor, and I do not see as yet from anything that has been said why the two new officers should be created.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the bill as originally framed and reported from the committee contemplated the deposit of the funds in banks exclusively, save where the banks refused to pay the stipulated interest. In that case, which would be rare in practice, it was provided that the funds might be invested in certain classes of securities. This substitute contemplates the deposit of funds primarily in the banks in the States where received. Failing to secure the number of banks to receive the moneys at the rate of interest stipulated, the trustees would then be called upon to invest the funds in such securities within the State as the state law prescribes as safe investments for savings bank funds. Where the state laws do not make provision guarding the investment of saving bank funds, the substitute provides that the character of the security shall be exacted in such State or States as the laws of New York or California prescribe. It is obvious when investments in securities become a part of the work, and a considerable part of it, that the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General can not give personal attention to investments in securities. The best they could do would be to see that the rules for the investment of the funds were strictly adhered to. The details of administration would of necessity be left to others.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Montana where this money would rest in the interval between the time that it was taken into the post-office and the time the board found a satisfactory investment for it?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, by the substitute bill the same provision is made with reference to the deposits in the local banks as in the original bill. By reference to section 10 the Senator will perceive that the money may be deposited in any solvent bank or banks in the neighborhood in which the funds are received. That is the first provision made in the section.

Mr. HEYBURN. Deposited without interest?

Mr. CARTER. Deposited at two and a quarter per cent per annum.

Mr. HEYBURN. But that requires a contract. Suppose, in view of the fact that it was intended by the board to find some other investment for it, the bank should decline to receive the money and agree to pay interest on it?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, that would drive the board to the alternative presented by the section—investment either in securities of the United States or securities of the State in which the money was received.

Mr. HEYBURN. Suppose there were none of either class in existence; what then? There are States that have no indebtedness, and United States securities are rather expensive when you pay the premium they command.

Mr. CARTER. Then, in the last resort, to which the Senator refers, the money would be, as provided by the section, deposited with the Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. By the postmaster. I find a missing link. I want to know where this money would rest between the time that the postmaster took it into his possession and the time when it was placed in the Treasury?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator will perceive, upon reading the bill, that the receipt, transmission, investment, and safeguarding of funds is placed in the charge of the board of trustees. The Postmaster-General is authorized, with the approval of the board, to issue all needful rules and regulations with reference to such business details as those to which the Senator refers. The mere form in which the postmaster at a small place would remit to a depository would vary under different conditions, and it is obviously better to leave the rule to be prescribed by the administrative officer under the authority of law. That, I think, provides for the missing link to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the link is still missing.

Mr. CARTER. I think if the Senator will read the bill carefully he will find——

Mr. HEYBURN. I have it before me.

Mr. CARTER. I think he will find that that link is strong enough to drag the load.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to ask the Senator if, under section 10 of the amendment, the trustees could not refuse to place the money in the local banks and send it direct to the Treasury of the United States, even though the local banks offered to give them bond or such other security as might be required?

Mr. CARTER. The word "may" is used instead of the word "shall," but in legal contemplation the word "may" is often held to be the equivalent of the word "shall." In this connection it is not made mandatory upon the board to deposit in the banks in the locality where the money is received, but that proceeding is the first mentioned in the section. It is obviously the purpose of the bill that the money be deposited in banks where two and a quarter per cent interest, or a greater amount, will be paid.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield further to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. Then, would it not be wise to amend section 10, in lines 11 and 12, by providing that the money shall not be sent to the Treasury if the required bond is given?

Mr. CARTER. That might be a wise amendment to reach that end. My purpose, Mr. President, at this moment is to make some progress with the bill. I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the parliamentary situation.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator was asked what was the object of adding two $10,000 positions to those already existing. I should like to have the Senator make some reply to that before he sits down. I myself can not see any necessity for it, although there may be such necessity.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the substitute for the bill provides a piece of machinery expected to ultimately handle by deposit in banks or investment in securities a sum that will reach the stupendous proportion of a billion dollars. I doubt not that within the space of one year there will be deposited in the post-offices of the country, of money not now in active use in the channels of trade, not less than $300,000,000.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to ask the Senator another question.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator permit me to answer the first one before he asks another?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. This sum will, according to the experience of other countries, continually increase. The board proposed to be created by the substitute will be charged with the sole responsibility for the investment, collection of interest, safety, and disposition of this vast sum of money. The Secretary of the Treasury can not go to distant States to inquire into investments. By the law of Iowa, I believe—and the laws of Iowa would be the rule of action as to securities for the board in that State—loans could be made upon improved real estate.

The same is true with reference to the investment of savings bank funds in many other States. The Secretary of the Treasury could not leave his station in this city to inquire into the value or character of real estate offered as security in California, in Iowa, or elsewhere; the Attorney-General could not; the Postmaster-General could not; and no officer charged with serious duties at the national capital in connection with other business of this Government could give adequate attention to the State laws of investment.

I believe one of the most conspicuous virtues in the substitute rests in the authority given to this board to loan these postal funds on improved real estate. I have been a witness in the growing parts of this country to the exorbitant rates of interest being charged farmers and citizens of growing towns to enable them to improve their places—rates of interest that, outside of the growing part of this country, would be regarded as usurious. The fund gathered up at the post-offices would have a strong tendency, if loaned as savings bank funds in the State, to reduce the rates of interest on farm loans and on improved property in the cities.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator permit me first to finish my answer?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. Two additional officers are provided here, to the end that they may give their entire time and undivided attention to this great financial operation as to the receipt of the money, its transmission, and its investment.

Mr. CLAPP and Mr. GALLINGER addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CARTER. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. I have been very much entertained by the answer of the Senator from Montana. The Government handles a great many hundreds of millions of dollars every year, but I do not think that the Secretary of the Treasury at present goes out and investigates all the reports that are turned in as to the standing of the banks that are designated as government depositories. Does the Senator from Montana think that two men could very carefully and personally examine all the applications for farm or other loans that might be made under any form of bill that would permit of the loaning of government money? I would take it that we ought to make the number, instead of two, about two hundred. Then, perhaps, they could give some personal attention to the matter.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I do not desire to be diverted by a detail. If it is the judgment of the Senate that the Secretary of the Treasury, the Attorney-General, and the Postmaster-General can give needed and adequate attention to this work, it will be an easy matter to strike out that portion of the bill providing for the two additional members of the board, but that a board is more desirable than a single individual to administer a great fund of this kind is, I think, beyond dispute.

Mr. CLAPP. Then, Mr. President, if that be true, we ought to consolidate some of the departments and make them into boards. We have run this Government more than one hundred years with departments and with one head to each department. If it is a fact that a board can do better than the head of a department, it is time some change was being inaugurated.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. I had the pleasure of hearing the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] at the beginning of this debate reply to a suggestion that this was a bill to put the Government into the banking business. He said that this was really not a banking business, but it was merely receiving this money and taking good care of it. Waiving for the time the suggestion that the Government has the right to take care of what the people earn, I now discover that he has, as men usually do, progressed in this argument, and if I did not misunderstand him a moment ago, I heard him suggest that the Government was not only going into the business of loaning money, but by engaging in that business itself it would reduce the rate of interest in the communities where this money would be loaned. I understand that that is now the position of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. I say, as to farm loans, that would probably be the effect.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the Senator from Montana abandons the original proposition that this bill does not put the Government into any kind of business, and he now advances the proposition that it puts it into a good kind of a business.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, "the Senator from Montana" does not abandon any position previously taken. The bill as originally presented contemplated the disposition of funds in one of two ways: First, by the deposit in national banks in the locality where received, at a stipulated rate of interest, which has not been changed by the amended or substitute bill. Second, failing to secure depositories willing to pay the 2½ per cent interest, the Postmaster-General was authorized to invest the funds in certain specified securities. There has been no change in principle, nor is there any departure in principle, from the original proposition in that regard.

It was objected in many quarters that the bill as originally presented divided the financial operations of the Government between two Cabinet officers—one the Postmaster-General, controlling one large bank account, and the Secretary of the Treasury, another; that something should be done to insure harmonious action as to the financial operations; that a board would be a more responsible agency to handle a great trust fund of this kind than a single Cabinet officer. Therefore the board is substituted for the Postmaster-General, he, however, remaining within the management as a member of that board.

Mr. BAILEY. With loans on farm lands added as an additional function of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. CARTER. There is no reference to farm lands in the bill, but it does provide that the class of securities in which a state savings bank invests in the State may be the subject of the investment of the funds in that State.

Mr. BAILEY. I simply want to repeat what I said a moment ago, and that is that the explanation which the Senator from Montana made of the bill at the opening of the debate will not square with the speech he has just delivered. In other words, his answer to the objection that this bill was putting the Government in the banking business then was that it was in no essential particular characteristic of the banking business. Now the Senator comes and before the bill becomes a law undertakes to extend the operations of the Government in this new field of finance, and he proposes now to allow those who must invest its funds to enter into competition with the people who loan money on farm mortgages.

I have no particular regard for those who loan money on farm mortgages. I belong to the class that borrows and not to the class that loans, and naturally my sympathies would be with any system, a proper one in itself, which tended to reduce the rate of interest on farm loans. But I have never yet believed that the Federal Government has that power; and when I do believe it I will adopt the old Farmers' Alliance proposition, to loan it on farm lands whenever the farmers need it.

Mr. SMOOT. And direct.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator will indulge me for a moment, I should like to say a word in reply to the last statement of the Senator from Texas.

The Senator from Texas unconsciously confuses the disposition of the fund with the receipt of the fund. The complaint of the banker everywhere has been that the opening of the post-office to the receipt of a deposit deprived the local bank of the deposit thus made, and therefore a competition with the banker was built up under the patronage of the Government. I insisted then, and I insist now, that there is no element of banking in the proposed postal depository system. It is true that small sums, not more than a hundred dollars a month, and not to exceed $500 in the aggregate, may be received under this proposed measure at any money-order post-office from any person over the age of 10 years, but there all similarity to banking ceases—in the mere matter of deposit—because be it known and always remembered that we do not propose that any postmaster shall become a banker. We will not sell exchange——

Mr. BAILEY. We do that now.

Mr. CARTER. We will not loan money at the post-office; we will not discount paper, or in any sense come into competition with the local bank or any other bank.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not confuse the operation of receiving and lending this money. I perfectly understand the distinction between the two. I was not repeating the bankers' complaint, that by receiving the deposit the Government receives it instead of the bank. I was referring to the Senator's statement that by loaning this money on farm mortgages he was going to reduce the rate of interest, and if that is not a banking operation I am not qualified to describe one.

I desire to say that my objections to this bill are not merely that the Government ought not to go into the banking business. I object to the Government going into any business, and, strange as it may seem, one of these evils brings another. For forty years the Government of the United States has permitted a certain class of bankers to engage in the Government's business of issuing money, and now the Government proposes to go into the banking business in competition with these same people; and thus it will always happen that time sets things even. A government that will permit citizens or corporations to go into its business in time will itself engage in the business of individuals or corporations.

Mr. CARTER. The test applied by the Senator to the banking business, or the definition he would have us accept, might with equal force be applied to every trust fund accumulated under any and all conditions. For instance, the great insurance companies of the country accumulate reserves, and they make certain earnings, not through the banking business, but by the investment of the accumulation. The Government has a great trust fund here to administer——

Mr. BAILEY. If the Government has accumulated any money, I would require it to dispose of it, although I would do it as Andrew Jackson and his contemporaries did. I would deposit it among the several States rather than to engage in business with it; but, in view of the fact that they will soon be scraping the bottom of the Treasury, I hardly think it will be maintained that the analogy the Senator suggests is well taken. The insurance companies have more money than they need. The Government of the United States is very apt, before another twelvemonth, to need more money than it has.

Now, I do not deny the power of the Government to take care of its property, or to make any rule and regulation respecting it that it sees fit, but I do deny the duty of the Government and the power of the Government to take care of somebody's else property. If we have reached a point in the history of this Republic where the men who earn money are not capable of taking care of it, in God's name how can we expect them to take care of the Government?

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Texas brings forward an elemental, fundamental objection to this class of legislation. He has promised, and I hope he will in the very near future favor us with his views in extenso upon that feature of the case.

We are now confronted by a parliamentary situation. The Senator from Iowa presents an amendment, which is under consideration——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very anxious that no confusion shall arise with respect to this matter. It is true, is it not—and I now address myself to the Senator from Montana—that his original bill provided that the money collected in the post-offices must be deposited in national banks in the neighborhood, and it was only in the event that the money could not be so deposited, bearing the rate of interest specified in the law, that the Government was given the power to loan it upon any other security? That was the provision of the original bill?

Mr. CARTER. If the banks declined to receive the money at the rate of interest prescribed, the Postmaster-General, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney-General, might otherwise dispose of it in the manner specified.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is true, is it not, that the substitute you have now offered provides that the board of trustees created by the bill may, in the first instance, without attemping to give it to the banks, deposit the money in the Treasury of the United States, to be withdrawn from the Treasury under the conditions there specified?

Mr. CARTER. The amendment proposed as a substitute for the bill makes the Treasurer of the United States the treasurer of this fund, but provides, as the Senator will observe, that it shall always be treated as a trust fund, not as a part of the General Treasury resources.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think, possibly, the Senator does not catch the point of my question. My question is, Is there any obligation upon the part of the board of trustees to deposit any part of the money collected at the post-offices in the banks of the country, whether State or national?

Mr. CARTER. The board may deposit it in the banks or may otherwise invest it, as provided by this section. It is permissive.

Mr. CUMMINS. So originally the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads reported a bill which made it obligatory upon the Postmaster-General to deposit the money in national banks in the locality in which the money was received, and only in the event of an inability so to deposit it there and secure the stipulated rate of interest upon it was the Postmaster-General given the power to invest the money in other securities.

But under your substitute the board of trustees may ignore the banking institutions of the country entirely and deposit all the money in the Treasury of the United States, and withdraw it only for the purpose of investing in the various kinds of bonds or mortgages which are mentioned or described, either directly or indirectly, in the bill. That is the fundamental change that you have made in the bill, is it not?

Mr. CARTER. The treasurer of the fund being the Treasurer of the United States, the money may be deposited in the first instance with the Treasurer. It may, by direction of the board, be deposited by the Treasurer in banks, or it may be invested. The purpose of the section in that behalf is to have definite control in the Treasurer of the United States over these funds from the beginning as the treasurer of the fund. I concede that it is left to the board to determine whether they will invest in the class of securities named or deposit in the banks. They must, of course, make the rate of interest to be paid the depositors, and more, if possible; and in order to do this, it will be necessary either to deposit in the banks at the stipulated minimum rate of interest or else to invest in securities which will pay as good a rate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CUMMINS. I assumed that the Senator from Montana had yielded the floor.

Mr. CARTER. Before yielding the floor——

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to say something upon my amendment to the original proposition.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Iowa the propriety of withdrawing his amendment as applied to the original bill, for the reason that the substitute eliminates two of the points to which the Senator objected—the garnishment feature and the exemption from taxation feature. Thus the amendment proposes to strike out a section, for the reason that it contains these two objectionable features, which will not appear in the substitute if the substitute is taken for the original bill. In order to make progress in the consideration of the subject-matter, the substitute being offered by the committee in lieu of the original, I suggest to the Senator the propriety of withdrawing the amendment and allowing the substitute to be placed before the Senate as the main measure to be considered.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not want to obstruct this measure in the slightest degree, but I can see some difficulty in pursuing the course suggested by the Senator from Montana. It may very well be that if the Senate should find the amendments I have proposed wise, and should therefore adopt them, it might be still less inclined to adopt the substitute proposed by the Senator from Montana or the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. I am therefore not prepared just at this moment to agree to the course named by the Senator from Montana. But I do assure him that I will facilitate the progress of this bill in every way that I can, for I believe in a postal savings system, and I should like to see the Senate adopt such a system. I should be very sorry to see it adopt the system attempted to be created by the substitute. I think no more serious blow could be inflicted upon the measure as a whole than for the Senate to adopt the substitute.

I desire, while I have the floor, to say an additional word with regard to the amendments I have proposed, for I especially want the Senator to understand clearly the difference between those amendments and the substitute. When the original bill was proposed it contained section 10, which provided, among other things, that the deposits should constitute a first lien upon the assets of the bank in which the deposits were made; second, that the deposits should be exempt from attachment or legal process for the indebtedness of the depositor; third, that the deposits should be exempt from taxation; and, fourth, that the employees of the Post-Office Department should give no information with respect to the deposit of any particular person. To strike out those provisions was one part of the amendment I proposed, and, as I understand, the substitute frankly concedes that part of my amendment, and we may therefore dismiss that phase of the case.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER. It may be unimportant, but I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that the substitute contains a provision against employees giving any information.

Mr. CUMMINS. I had not read it carefully enough to know whether it reproduced that part of the bill or not. However, I regard that as a very immaterial thing.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CARTER. Section 10, which the Senator's amendment proposed to strike out, contained, as he suggested, four propositions: First, the postal savings fund was declared to be public money and subject to the safeguards, and so forth, surrounding public moneys by law; second, exemption from garnishment; third, exemption from taxation; and, fourth, a prohibition upon the communication by postal employees of any information concerning the account of a depositor. The substitute retains the prohibition as to giving information concerning the state of any depositor's account and a later section provides that the postal savings funds received under this act shall be guarded as public moneys.

Mr. CUMMINS. You mean protected by the criminal statutes?

Mr. CARTER. The criminal statutes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Montana seems to have overlooked the provision in line 16 on page 18, which says that the portions of these funds in the Treasury of the United States are trust funds. I can not reconcile the fact that they are to be trust funds in the Treasury of the United States with the declaration upon which the Senator seems to rely, on page 10, line 8, that they are to be public moneys.

Mr. CARTER. The Treasurer of the United States is the treasurer of this fund, and if the Senator will carefully read the language he will find they are to be held in an account called a "trust account," so as to differentiate between that class of money and the public money.

Mr. HEYBURN. Unfortunately the language does not bear out any such conclusion.

Mr. CUMMINS. I recur to the statement I was making when interrupted, that section 10 provided these four things, and I now understand that the substitute does not reproduce any of them save the declaration that the money is public money, and therefore surrounded by all the protection that the criminal statutes furnish to public moneys, and, secondly, an inhibition upon employees from giving information. I care nothing about either of those things. The three chief features of section 10 were, first, giving the deposit preference over other deposits; second, exemption from legal process; and, third, exemption from taxation; and neither of those features is found in the substitute, as I understand.

Mr. CARTER rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am simply stating that as my understanding of the substitute which the Senator has now presented.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator's understanding is correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. However, the amendment I proposed with respect to section 10, while of importance in a general way, was insignificant as compared with the amendment I proposed to section 11. The objection which the people of this country—those who have come into contact with me; those who have communicated with me upon the subject—have to a postal savings bank system is that it will withdraw the money which naturally accumulates in a given locality or given community and take it into some distant town or locality, and thereby prevent that money from doing the work it ought to do in the proper locality. I have had that objection dinned into my ears so often that I must assume there is some validity in it. Any particular locality has a business of its own, it has a trade of its own, it has a commerce which is peculiar to itself, and the money which is necessary to carry on that trade, that business, that commerce, gathers somewhere in that locality; and not only the bankers, but the business men of any such locality are extremely solicitous that it shall not be taken away by any artificial means, especially at a time when money is most needed to transact the business of the community.

The objection these people urged to the bill as originally reported by the committee was that it limited the deposit of money received at the post-offices to the national banks, and it was believed that the state institutions would suffer because of this discrimination in favor of the national banks. Therefore my amendments proposed that the Postmaster-General, who was then invested with the custody of this money, should—not might, not if he thought best to do so, but that he should—take the money collected at any given post-office and deposit it ratably in the banks of the town or city in which the post-office was situated.

It was believed that under such a command and under such a practice there would be no disturbance of the financial conditions of any locality and the banks would continue to do their business as heretofore, and the Government would interfere as little as possible with the business of the country, at the same time affording security and safety to those who desired to deposit their money with the postmasters.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator from Iowa whether we are to understand that the committee in this substitute bill have accepted his suggestion that the funds deposited by depositors with the Post-Office Department shall be put in state banks as well as in national banks?

Mr. CUMMINS. I was about to say that it seems to me the substitute bill is one which, to use a familiar phrase—

> Keeps the word of promise to our ear,
> And breaks it to our hope.

There is no discrimination or distinction in the substitute bill between banks, and I take it that these trustees may, if they please, deposit the money in state banks as well as national banks. But there is no requirement that they shall do it, nor is there any requirement that they shall deposit the money in any bank whatsoever.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If it will not interrupt the course of the Senator's argument——

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to ask him whether he contends that the deposit of these funds should be made in state banks without giving the Government of the United States the power to examine those banks and to determine upon their solvency?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I did so contend; I do so contend. I believe that the Government of the United States can very well accept the examination of these banks made by the several States, for the history of state banks, as compared with national banks, reflects a great deal of credit upon the state banks, and the depositors of those banks have lost less, proportionately, than the depositors of national banks.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As I understand it, the Senator from Iowa contends that the United States Government, in making these deposits, should rely entirely upon the examination made by the state authorities, so far as the state banks are concerned.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not say so, because the amendments that I offered contained the further provision that the bank in which the deposit was made should give to the United States ample security, by way of a bond of indemnity, to repay any money that may have been deposited in the bank by the Government of the United States.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But I understand that the Senator does not require any examination by the United States authorities of the local banks, and that, so far as the examination is concerned, he relies entirely upon the examination of the local authorities.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, let me suggest to the Senator that the National Government ought certainly to be as exacting in its requirements of the state banks as it is of national banks so far as the security of those state banks is concerned.

The Senator well knows that the national-bank act provides for a reserve of 15 per cent in the case of country banks and of 25 per cent in the case of the reserve city banks. The Senator knows that in the legislation of some States there is practically no requirement regarding reserves, or, at all events, the requirement is so low as practically to amount to no security whatever.

The Senator will recall that during the last panic the fact was developed that there were about $10,000,000,000 on deposit in all the banks of the country outside of the savings banks deposits, and that more than one-half of those deposits were in the state banks; and notwithstanding that fact seven-tenths of the total reserves of national and state banks were in the national banks, and only three-tenths of the total reserves were in the state banks—an entirely insufficient amount. In other words, the average reserve in the national banks was about 15 per cent, and the average reserve in the state banks was less than 6 per cent.

I ask the Senator whether it is not a reasonable requirement, when you propose to put these state banks upon an equality with the national banks, so far as the deposit of these postal funds is concerned, to require of them the same reserves that are required of national banks, because the Senator of course recognizes the fact that, outside of the question of a general guaranty of all the banks for the deposits of a bank—a system which has not yet gone into operation anywhere except in one or two States—the security relied upon must be a sufficient reserve and a sufficient capital.

It seems to me that whilst the national-bank act has been noticeably deficient thus far in not requiring a certain proportion of capital to the obligations the bank assumes in the shape of deposits, yet it has been wise in its requirement as to reserves, though not sufficiently wise. But the Senator's amendment, it seems to me, would permit this system of state banks with insufficient reserves to continue. The Senator realizes that the State of New York——

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to answer your questions one at a time; but if you include them in a speech of an hour in length, I can not remember all the questions.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is not my intention to make a speech. I will yield the floor, of course, if the Senator objects.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not object.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not propose to make a long speech, but what I wish to do is to make a comprehensive——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for the purpose of allowing the Senator to ask me any question he desires; but I want him to ask me a question, and then let me answer it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. What I wished to make was a comprehensive statement, so that he could answer it, as to whether it is not just and proper that the National Government in accepting the state banks as depositories of these funds which are intrusted to them should exact the same requirement of state banks, regarding both capital and reserves, that it exacts of the national banks?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, although I do not believe that the question propounded by the Senator from Nevada is at all material to the question I am discussing, yet I have no hesitation whatever in answering it just as fairly and as fully as I can.

I understand that the reserves required of national banks constitute only one method for securing the repayment of deposits, and in the panic of 1907 the reserves melted away so that the people generally were not able to observe them. So long as the Government permits one bank to deposit its reserves in another bank, and so on throughout a long chain, I do not regard the reserves that are required by the national law as any security whatever for the depositors, and I would much rather depend upon some other method of ascertaining the solvency of the bank.

However, in the discussion in which I had the honor to engage the other day, I illustrated the safety of state banks, even without a reserve required by law, by a reference to the history of my own State, running over the last six years, and it was there ascertained that the depositors of the state banks suffered not half so much by the failure of banks as the depositors in the national banks.

All that we want is to see to it that the Government shall be secure, that the Government will be likely to receive from these banks these deposits when demanded. If the history of the state banks shows conclusively that the depositors in the state banks fare better than the depositors in the national banks, it seems to me there ought to be no hesitation in trusting the state banks with the government deposits, especially if there be required of the state banks an adequate bond of indemnity.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me suggest to the Senator from Iowa that whilst it may be true that the banking system of Iowa is a perfect one, it may not be true that the banking systems of the other 45 States are perfect. The Senator's amendment proposes that we shall authorize the deposit of these moneys in the banks of every State in the Union.

Mr. CUMMINS. And the Territories.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And the Territories. My criticism is directed against the state banks in their aggregate. It may be that in a particular State every requirement of caution may be enforced, but certainly when we find that the state banks in the aggregate had deposits of over $5,000,000,000 outside of the savings banks, and that they had in their vaults only $300,000,000, to wit, 5 per cent of their total liabilities to their depositors, we can not say that as a whole the state banks are safe.

I join with the Senator in his criticism of the national banking system, which permits a country bank to count as its reserve the money which it deposits in a New York bank. I believe that that should be remedied; but in the aggregate, when you contrast the national banks with the state banks you will find that the national banks had a deposit of about the same amount or a little less, about $5,000,000,000, and had on hand $700,000,000, as against the state banks' $300,000,000; or, in other words, they had a total reserve of more than double the amount which the state banks had.

Now, it does seem to me that if we enter upon this legislation we should perfect, in the first place, or it can be done later, I presume, our national bank system, so as to do away with the system of country banks counting as their reserve the moneys that are deposited in the central reserve cities, and that we should, at all events, require of the state banks in which these funds are deposited the same security regarding both reserve and capital that are required of the national banks.

I hope that later on we will require additional capital of our national banks, so that there will be some proportion between their capital and their obligations. There is none now. The path of reform lies upon these two lines—increase of reserves and increase of capital. It seems to me that in perfecting this system we should compel the state banks, or at least persuade them, if we are to give them any privileges under this act, to comply with the national-bank requirements regarding both reserves and capital.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as I remarked in answer to the previous question of the Senator from Nevada, I think the point the Senator is now making is not fairly involved in the discussion which is now in progress. I care not how rigid the requirement be made testing the solvency of the state banks. I have no desire that any moneys deposited by the Government shall be deposited in banks that are not worthy of trust. My point is, and in that I am sure I have the sympathy of the distinguished Senator from Nevada, that if the Postmaster-General is to deposit the money collected at the post-offices in banks he must deposit it in all the banks of that vicinity which are worthy of confidence and trust.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am quite with the Senator in that purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Surely, I was confident the Senator was of the same mind with regard to that proposition. That was the real point of the amendment I offered to the original bill. I did not want to leave it in the discretion of the Postmaster-General to distribute the funds even among the national banks. There is not a Senator here who does not know how the deposits are now made in the depositories throughout the country. I do not want to subject the institutions I have the honor to represent to the burden of coming to Washington and through their Representatives in Congress or their Senators bringing to bear such influence as they can upon the Secretary of the Treasury in order to increase the deposit in any particular bank or in any particular locality. It is not fair either to the institutions or to the Representatives of the people here.

There must be this justice done as automatically and as independently as possible, and therefore my amendment commanded a ratable distribution among all the banks of the locality, according to the capital, provided those institutions were located in a State that did exact a proper supervision and examination of its banks. That was the whole object of my amendment.

Now, we find a substitute which destroys the original purpose of the bill, which removes it entirely from its first field and occupies, as the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has so well said, quite another. You now have a substitute for the bill which does not require one penny of the money to be deposited in any bank, which permits every dollar of it to be withdrawn from the localities in which it is collected, and then to be invested in a variety of ways.

So far as I have been able to view this measure, if it becomes a law it will inflict a disaster upon the banks, upon the general financial institutions of the part of the country with which I am most familiar, the extent of which it is impossible, as I think, to overestimate.

What is it you now propose? To take this money, bring it to the Treasury of the United States, and then say to these trustees, "You can invest it, if you like, in Government bonds." I say very frankly that if we had Government bonds in which this money could be invested as a permanent policy, I would rather see the savings of the people invested in the bonds of the Government than in any other way whatsoever.

But the distinguished Senator in charge of the bill has not pointed out that we are to have these continuing and permanent securities, unless, indeed, he anticipates that the liberality of this Congress will make it certain that the Government shall issue bonds to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government in a time of profound peace. If that is his anticipation, I earnestly hope that it will not be realized.

Where are the government bonds in which the savings of the people are to be invested? I am not so familiar with the financial operations of the Government as is the Senator from Montana, but I do not know of any bonds in any large amounts that can be used for the purpose of investing these savings of the people.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CARTER. It is a matter of current knowledge, I think, that we shall issue something in the neighborhood of $200,000,000 to build the Panama Canal, and that, too, within the next few years—probably as much as $300,000,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it is more than probable that we will issue bonds for the completion of the Panama Canal, but Senators will remember that only a few moments ago the Senator from Montana declared that within a very short time the Government would collect at these post-offices as the savings of the people more than a billion dollars. Do you hope that there will be bonds of the United States issued to the extent of a billion dollars in order to provide some method of investing these savings?

I think, upon reflection, the Senator from Montana will at once agree with me that the real purpose of the substitute is to authorize the Government to invest these savings in notes and mortgages and municipal bonds and other securities of that character. I for one can not assent to the proposition that the Government of the United States shall enter the business of loaning money on farm mortgages or upon any other security of that character in competition with the thousands of savings banks throughout the length and breadth of the country.

It will be, as I think, a sad day for the savings banks, the worthiest institutions in our land of a financial character, when the Government of the United States undertakes to loan these moneys upon the securities which have been authorized in behalf of the savings banks. I for one want to see the savings banks invest this money. I am willing to see the Government deposit it in the savings banks.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. There has been so very much said upon the matter of government investment of these funds, I should like to ask the Senator his own opinion as to his own State, whether the banks of his State would not take up every dollar that would be collected in his State at 2½ per cent? I know they would in my own State, and that there would not be one cent to invest in anything from any source whatever. I wish to ask, merely for information, whether in the State of Iowa, if it was left at 2½ per cent, and not to the highest bidder or anything of that kind, all that would probably go into the post-offices in the State of Iowa would not be taken by the banks of that State at that rate of interest?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I answer the question of the Senator from North Dakota with the greatest pleasure, because it accords wholly with the argument I am attempting to make. Under present conditions, under any conditions, one who endeavors to look into the future can foresee that the banks of our State would take not only every cent deposited in the post-offices in our State under this system at 2½ per cent, but if they had the opportunity to do it I believe they would take all the money deposited in North Dakota and South Dakota and in Nebraska under this system. They would have no difficulty whatsoever in absorbing those moneys and turning them into the ordinary channels of commerce and business.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask another question right along there?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not the Senator believe that the same conditions which prevail in his State prevail almost universally over the entire United States?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do so believe.

Mr. McCUMBER. That being the case, it does seem to me that we are worrying more than is necessary about the Government investing funds that the banks will not take. As I understand the bill, it is only in case the banks will not receive this money at 2½ per cent that there is any other provision made for loaning it. If that is not the provision of the bill, it certainly should be made the provision of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I must ask the Senator to read carefully section 10 of the substitute. There is no requirement that the board of trustees shall even endeavor to secure from the banks an agreement to pay interest upon the deposits or any obligation to deposit any part of this money in any bank, State or national.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, all I can say in response is that I do not think such a bill will ever get through the Senate or the House, or that it will ever become a law, unless it does provide that the funds collected by the post-offices in the State shall be used in that State and turned into the banks in that State, if the banks will receive them.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that is the very point I have been attempting to emphasize; it is the very conclusion to which I have been trying to bring the Members of the Senate. That is the fundamental and essential difference between the amendments that I have offered to the original bill and the substitute now brought forward by the committee. In the one, the command was given to the Postmaster-General, or to whomsoever might have control of these moneys, to deposit them, if he could, in the banks in the vicinity at the rate of 2½ per cent per annum. In the substitute now brought forward the discretion is reposed entirely, without any limit, without any restriction, in the board of trustees to either deposit the money in the banks or deposit it in the Treasury of the United States, to be invested in the bonds and securities which I have been attempting to describe. There is all the difference that lies between the banks using these moneys to carry on the business which they have been accustomed to do and the Government of the United States entering the occupation of loaning money in competition with its citizens and its banks upon real estate security or such other security as the laws of the particular State may authorize.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield the floor entirely, Mr. President, as I have finished.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well; I shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the provision of section 10, if the Secretary of the Treasury did deposit the money in a local bank it would be almost the same as money deposited on call, would it not?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so.

Mr. SMOOT. If that is the case, would the banks of Iowa, if the money were on call, be willing to pay 2¼ per cent on such call money?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, answering the question of the Senator from Utah, I would say that I believe the banks of Iowa would be so willing. I do not want him to understand me to affirm that upon an ordinary checking deposit, which may disappear any day and which disappears often in the course of business, our banks would be willing to pay 2¼ per cent interest; but our banks are now paying 2 per cent interest upon all the State funds, and they are all checking funds. They are paying that interest because everybody knows that in the regular course of business there will be on hand at all times substantially steady amounts. Just so in the case of post-office savings, once we have established the policy; the history of all countries shows that such deposits increase and do not diminish. Therefore our banks, in treating with the Postmaster-General, would understand that the deposits were not likely to diminish, but would continue practically the same.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator a question upon that point. Could that not be remedied or fixed entirely by a rule which would require that the banks should pay on the average daily balance during any month?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is precisely what my amendments provide.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no criticism to offer to the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Iowa, because I think the amendment as proposed by him would have that very effect.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. But the present section 10 of the bill, it seems to me, would have the effect of placing that money, as it were, upon call.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. And if the Secretary of the Treasury desired to make an investment any day he could call the money from the bank for that purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, answering the further suggestion of the Senator from Utah, I am very clear that, if the board of trustees were going forward to invest as rapidly as it could these moneys in mortgages and securities, the banks would not hold the funds subject to those drafts and pay any interest at all.

Mr. SMOOT. That was exactly the idea that I wanted to bring out in asking the question I did of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, while the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] has made this bill better in some respects by his substitute, I think he has made it much worse in other regards. If I may briefly state to the Senator from Montana what I believe would be satisfactory to my State at least, and I believe to the Northwestern States generally, I would say that what we expect is simply that the money collected in any town or city shall be deposited in the banks in that city or town, and that it shall be deposited without reference to whether the bank is a state bank or a national bank, provided it is a solvent bank; and, secondly, that the same character of securities that are generally recognized by the State, where the state moneys go into those banks, shall be required of them as depositories of these national funds, and that they will not go out of the State except in such cases and under such emergencies as where there is so much money in the banks of the State which is idle that there will practically be no demand for such funds, and that the banks will therefore not pay the 2¼ per cent interest.

Another objection that we have to the bill in its present form is the limit of 2¼ per cent interest as the minimum, leaving it open to the Government to charge a greater per cent. I do not believe that we want to take this fund and hold it out to the highest bidder, to any bank that will give the most for it, because the only object of securing this fund is that we may make it yield enough to pay the 2 per cent interest and the cost to the Government in taking care of the fund for the people. There we ought to rest.

I am glad, Mr. President, the Senator has left out the preferential provision, because I think it is objectionable to nearly every person. But the Senator has taken out of the bill a provision which I believe was and is essential to it, although I disagree upon the matter with the Senator from Iowa, and that is as to the exemption of these funds from taxation. While the Senator from Montana seems to partially admit that these funds may be the subject of taxation, and that we would have no power to exempt them from taxation, I have heard no reason that would justify a conclusion to that effect.

Let me ask the Senator one or two questions. First, if this bill shall go through both Houses of Congress and be signed by the President, will it be a constitutional law? I think the Senator, without going any further, will answer that it will be a constitutional law. Very well, then, Mr. President, if that law is constitutional, it is the supreme law of the land. If it is the supreme law of the land, not only must state constitutions, but state legislative acts, yield to it.

What is the object of this bill? The object, I believe the Senator will answer, and the only object, is to encourage thrift and economy by finding a place for the deposit of the funds of the working and the poorer classes in this country where such funds will be secured to them and where they will produce a little income. All right. Now, assuming that the Senator has agreed with me upon that proposition, the next one that naturally follows is, If that is the object, can that object be destroyed by a state legislature or by the legislation or the constitution of any State in the Union? If we can tax this fund in any way, the Senator will agree with me that we can destroy it, because the power of taxation carries with it the power of destruction.

Let me make that matter clear. Nearly every constitution—and if not the constitution, nearly every law in every State—provides that the property in that State for the purposes of taxation shall be assessed according to its actual value. When you come to assess horses and cattle and lands, the assessor may draw upon his imagination, more or less, as to the value of any of that property, and, as a matter of fact, we know that generally such property is not assessed at more than from one-half to two-thirds of its actual value. No one suffers and no one objects so long as the same class of property is assessed in the same manner throughout the State; but suppose the matter comes up to the assessor in this way: Here is a deposit certificate that calls for $100. The very moment that is deposited it is worth $100. Can an assessor say that a check given upon a solvent bank, where the drawer of that check has funds to meet that check, for $100 is worth less than $100? Can the assessor in assessing it for taxation place a value upon it of less than $100? If he can not, then he has got to assess it at its true value; and every dollar of this fund, if it could be assessed at all, could be assessed at its full value.

If we go into Montana, Idaho, Iowa, or any of those western States we find that most of the little cities and towns, not being satisfied to grow gradually and to secure all of the usual benefits of great cities in the way of electric lights, water supply, sewerage, and so forth, have bonded themselves very heavily for all of these luxuries. The result is that the taxes run from 2 to 8 per cent, and I know of many cities where they are 6 and 7 per cent upon the valuation of their property. Here is a fund drawing 2 per cent interest. If the State or the city can tax that fund at all, it can tax it for 6 per cent or 8 per cent interest, as the legislature of that State may desire, and it may absolutely destroy the very object of this proposed law.

I maintain that if the State has a valid right to destroy by taxation, by garnishment, by reason of any judgment, or other mesne process, such action would be destructive of the very object of this law, and if it can destroy the law, then the law is not constitutional, because either this law must be supreme or the tax law of the State must be supreme. They both can not be supreme where one can actually destroy the object of the other.

Therefore, Mr. President, I am free to say that I certainly shall insist that we shall have in this bill a provision such as was contained in the original bill, that the indebtedness owed by the Government to the individual should be absolutely free from taxation, so that the boy, or the girl, or the workingman who has a hundred dollars and desires to deposit it in the post-office at the rate of 2 per cent a year, need not have a fear that it will be taxed at the rate of 6 or 7 or 8 per cent a year and thereby entirely destroy the investment feature.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am entirely in sympathy with the purpose of this bill, which, as I understand is, first, to encourage thrift amongst the people, and, second, to keep in circulation the money which otherwise would go into safe-deposit vaults and stockings. I am particularly in sympathy with the second purpose, which involves the keeping of the money in circulation.

I have not yet made up my mind as to whether I shall vote for this bill. That depends a good deal upon the amendments which may be offered to it and accepted by the Senate.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] made a very pertinent inquiry, and that was as to whether the deposits made by the National Government in the banks were not practically call loans. It seems to me that they are unmistakably call loans, and I doubt very much the wisdom of permitting the General Government to allow the proposed board of trustees to withdraw the loans at any time from the local banks for the purpose of investing them in securities of their own choosing. I think by reason of such action at any time we might be likely to have a stringency precipitated upon any community in this country, particularly in the South and in the West.

The very fact that this is a call loan shows the necessity of the state banks having a sufficient reserve, for the purpose of the reserve is to meet the checks of depositors. The United States Government, whenever the postal depositors should call for their money, would have to call upon the banks for the money, and the banks would have to respond. It is of the highest importance, therefore, that they should have a sufficient reserve. It seems to me that it is essential, in securing the solvency of state banks, that we should compel them to comply with all the requirements that we exact of the national banks regarding their reserves.

We know that in some of the States of the Union a system of banking has grown up, particularly under the trust-company system, under which practically no reserves have been kept. That was for a long time the case in the State of New York. Numerous trust companies there having enormous deposits and enormous investments held an actual cash reserve of not exceeding 1 or 2 per cent, and the advantage in profit making which, under the law, they had over the national banks was such that almost every national bank in a large city in the State of New York regarded it as essential to organize a trust company under the state law. The stockholders of the national bank would be stockholders of the trust company, or the stock of the trust company would be held by the national bank, in order to give the national bank the same facility that the state banks had for enjoying profit.

If you will look over the history of the condition of the national banks in New York during the last panic, you will find that their condition was endangered by reason of the condition of the state trust companies, the business of which was done at the back doors of the national banks and was incorporated with the business of the national banks in such a way as to endanger the solvency of the national banks themselves.

Here we propose to put the state banks upon a par with the national banks so far as their being depositories of postal savings funds, which are practically national funds though belonging to the postal depositors. It seems to me that it is only fair and proper that we should exact of such banks the same examination by the United States Government that is exacted of national banks and the same requirements as to reserves; and I trust that hereafter the same requirements will be exacted regarding capital, for it is only by demanding an adequate capital and adequate reserves that each individual bank can be made to respond promptly to its depositors.

I am in sympathy with the Senator from Iowa in his demands that the state banks should have the same privileges as the national banks in the deposits of postal savings funds, but good banking demands that if they are to have the same privileges they must be subject to the same obligations as the national banks in regard to the reserves which they shall keep on hand and as to the capital which they shall maintain.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, this discussion seems to hang the fate of postal savings depositories upon the manner in which the fund shall be disposed of when collected at the post-offices. There does not appear to be any opposition in the Chamber to receiving deposits in the amount and to the extent specified in the substitute. Judging by the course of the debate, all Senators are agreed, with one or two exceptions, that the depository system may be useful and is to be commended. But, notwithstanding the benefits to flow from the establishment of the proposed system, the discussion seems to disclose certain irreconcilable divisions on the manner of disposing of the fund.

It is obvious that the Government can not receive deposits at the post-offices and agree to pay 2 per cent per annum thereon without making some use of the money, so as to earn the amount of the interest to be paid plus the expenses of administration. The original bill proposed that the amount of money necessary to pay the interest to the depositors and the expenses of administration should be secured by depositing the funds at interest in banks organized under national law and doing business in the neighborhood where the deposits were received.

In order that the Government might be secured for the repayment of the deposits, it was provided that the postal savings fund deposited in banks should be a prior lien on all the resources of the banks.

Senators objected most strenuously to that safeguard thrown around these funds. It was suggested, and argued very vehemently, that thus making the Government a preferred creditor of a national bank to the extent of the postal fund deposited therein was an unjust discrimination against other depositors of the bank. Others said that the state banks would be discriminated against because the national banks only were named. In order to reconcile the various divergent views the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] presented an amendment, which is the pending amendment, and in so far as applicable to this phase of the subject, substituted for the class of security contemplated by the bill a system of security bonds, to be given by the banks in which funds might be deposited—that is, a bond signed by farmers and merchants and others in the neighborhood where the bank happened to be doing business.

With all due respect to this class of bonds, I think we may be wisely admonished by experience as to their utter insufficiency. I should regard the security proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa as a substitution of mere straw bonds as security for government deposits. It is known to the Senator from Iowa and to everyone that when a bank is called upon to execute an attachment bond or an accommodation bond of any kind, character, or description, including that for the security of deposits, it is not the depositor in the bank who signs the bond, but it is some poor fellow who is in debt to the bank, and therefore can not say "No." When a bank fails the debtor fails, as accommodations can not be any longer extended, and the very thing against which we seek to guard—the loss of the government money—would come to pass through the failure of the bank, and the bond would likewise become valueless because of the bank's failure. It would be just as well to take no security at all for postal savings funds as to allow the bond of Tom, Dick, and Harry to be filed with the Treasurer of the United States or the Postmaster-General as security for a deposit made by the Government. In case the bank should fail, of course, the bond would fail with it.

Finally, that class of bonds, so-called "securities," would merely result in burdening the postal savings fund with an interminable number of lawsuits wherever a failure occurred to any bank in which such a deposit happened to repose at the time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. In view of what has just been stated by the Senator from Montana, will he be good enough to explain what kind of securities is intended in lines 10, 11, and 12, upon page 7, of the substitute, where it is said:

> The board of trustees taking from such bank or banks such security for deposits so made as they shall deem necessary to insure the safety of the same.

Mr. CARTER. The substitute proposes to take security. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa proposes to take bonds. We know what that class of bonds amounts to as security.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have been a practicing lawyer, dealing with that kind of bonds for twenty-eight or thirty years, and I have learned to look upon them as exceedingly valuable. I hardly remember an instance in which such a bond has not enabled the person to whom it was given to protect himself from loss. I can hardly understand the Senator from Montana——

Mr. CARTER. I will ask the Senator if it is not a fact that in an average of 90 cases out of a hundred a bond of that kind must be sued upon in order to recover? No one voluntarily pays that kind of a bond. They pay it at the end of a lawsuit, when they must.

Mr. CUMMINS. Answering the Senator from Montana, it has been my observation that not one in ten has to be sued upon. Take, for instance, the great number of indemnifying bonds that are given every day by the surety companies of the United States. They indemnify corporations and persons against every contingency, and it is the rarest thing in the world that a suit is brought upon such a bond.

Mr. CARTER. Of course the indemnity companies, incorporated and doing business for a profit, may not be classed with those who, as a matter of accommodation, often, as would be the case in this instance, are so obligated to the banks that they could not refuse when requested, would sign a bond, and who would be loath to pay when the demand was made.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Montana will not fail to observe that under the amendment I propose the Postmaster-General could require a bond signed by one of these surety companies if the Postmaster-General thought such a bond was better security or better indemnity than one signed by individuals.

Mr. CARTER. I take it there is a vast difference between the meaning of "security" and "bond." They are far from being synonymous terms. The substitute under consideration requires that security be taken. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa provides that bonds be given, with sureties signing the same; and that would lead, I think, to interminable litigation wherever a loss occurred.

Mr. CUMMINS. The suggestion just made by the Senator from Montana may reveal a matter which is not apparent upon the first reading of the substitute. If I correctly understand what has just been stated by the Senator from Montana, this provision that I read a moment ago is intended to require a deposit of some property owned by the bank in order to secure these deposits; and if that be so, then you are accomplishing indirectly precisely what you tried to accomplish directly in the original bill.

I should like the Senate to understand whether it is contemplated that a bank in which money is deposited under the substitute may take from its assets any securities it may have and deposit them in order to protect the Government for the savings deposit.

Mr. CARTER. The board of trustees would be the sole judges as to the security necessary to insure perfect safety for these funds, and I desire to say to the Senator from Iowa that I will never consent to the passage of any bill which will scatter the accumulated savings of the people over the country in all kinds of business without security of some kind that is entirely adequate.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Montana recognizes that the Government is ample security for and to the depositor, does he not?

Mr. CARTER. That is true enough; the Government is responsible; but I think it is the duty of Congress in the transaction to protect the Government of the United States and the administration handling these funds.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is the view of the Senator from Montana that the depositors in these banks shall pay the losses that may occur?

Mr. CARTER. Undoubtedly; and it is my conviction that it is the duty of Congress to see that the fund is so conserved that it will, with its earnings, pay back the depositor without taxing the people of the United States to make up any deficiency; and when a bank desires to become the depository for any of these funds, it shall give such security as will convince an intelligent board that there is no reasonable probability of loss to be sustained by the transaction.

Mr. President, the Senator's amendment to section 10 of the bill has been by the new print disposed of. Only those portions are retained in the proposed substitute to which the Senator does not object. So I think we may lay on the table his amendment as to section 10 if the substitute is to be the basis for our action.

But before making any motion in that behalf, I desire briefly to refer to some observations made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. It is a well-known fact that the deposits in the banks of the country are rarely returned for taxation by the depositor. It is a notorious fact that the money of the country, wheresoever it may be when the assessor comes about, is returned only to a trifling extent for taxation anywhere. The bill as originally presented undertook to exempt these funds from taxation. The Senator from Iowa and other Senators questioned whether we could constitutionally do that. In my own humble judgment the exemption made by the bill would be ineffective for one part, and it might operate, if the view of the Senator prevails, to render the whole effort we are here making a nullity. The elimination of the exemption did not, in my judgment, necessarily result in leaving this money subject to taxation. Two questions will be presented: First, is the money due from the Government of the United States to the individual subject to taxation at all in any State? Second, how will the State tax the money?

A provision in the bill prohibits any agent, postmaster, or employee of the United States from giving any information to any person concerning the amount or condition of any deposit. The assessors could not acquire the information from the Post-Office Department, and according to all human experience they would get very little information from the depositor. So I think, as a practical matter, there would be very little, if any, of this money ever taxed anywhere.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator's concluding sentence perhaps answers my question. So the Senator in his somewhat adroitly drafted amendment believes that the billion of dollars that will be taken from the people and deposited will escape taxation absolutely? That is the Senator's conclusion, I assume.

Mr. CARTER. The billion dollars is yet to be received.

Mr. GALLINGER. I heard the Senator say to-day that in his opinion it would be received.

Mr. CARTER. That it would ultimately reach that sum.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken as to that; but whether it is a billion, or a half billion, or a quarter billion, or any other portion of a billion, what I want to find out is whether the Senator, in the draft that he is now asking us to support, believes that this money will avoid taxation in the State.

Mr. CARTER. I think the billion or the million, or whatsoever it may be, will pay just as much taxes as it now pays, for it does not pay any now.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will not pay as much taxes as is paid on deposits in the savings banks of New England, because they are taxed.

Mr. CARTER. A mere trifle; a certain limited portion of 1 per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Three-fourths of 1 per cent.

Mr. CARTER. Three-fourths of 1 per cent?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. We pay only 2 per cent, and the banks in the Senator's State pay an average of about 3½ per cent—3.70 per cent, I think it is, in the State of New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is about right.

Mr. CARTER. The tax is deducted before the interest is paid. It pays three-fourths of 1 per cent tax, and then 3.70 per cent besides. This money of the people, put in in small amounts, now in hiding, will pay no more tax in the hands of the Government than it pays in the hands of individuals; and in the hands of individuals, as I have suggested, it in the main pays no tax at all. So we are taking nothing at all from the treasury of any State, county, or municipality in the country in the way of taxes.

With reference to the objection of the Senator from Iowa to section 10 of the proposed substitute, I can only say it will be before the Senate for amendment and perfection. It is not pretended that the bill is perfect. I think it is an improvement in some respects upon the bill as previously presented. It was framed in the light of objections made from time to time by Senators on this floor and by others who urged their objections to the Postmaster-General and the members of the committee.

But how easily the objection of the Senator from Iowa may be disposed of! He says it is permissive only to deposit this money in the banks of the State, and inasmuch as it is only permissive, therefore the board would not deposit in the banks at all. The board would unquestionably attempt so to administer the law as to subserve the best interests of the whole country; and I take it for granted that any board charged with its administration would try to make of the investment feature a beneficial rather than a destructive agency in so far as the business of any section of the country is concerned. It is inconceivable that a board, given discretion to leave the deposits in the localities, doing business in the channels of trade, would willfully and deliberately, I may say maliciously, withdraw the money from the locality and congest it in the centers, for the purpose of doing an injury which could result in no good to any human being anywhere.

Mr. President, to my mind this discretion might be wisely left with the board having the administration of the fund in its charge, but if the Senator or other Senators, sufficient in number to make a majority of the body voting, desire to make it mandatory upon the trustees to leave the money in banks in the locality, then it is but necessary in line 7, page 10, to strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall," and later on provide in line 12 that if the banks in the neighborhood will not pay the rate of interest, then the money may be otherwise invested or taken to some other locality.

But, Mr. President, what I do insist upon is that we have some disposition made of the Senator's amendment, so that we may progress with the consideration of the bill as here presented. I think upon mature deliberation and with slight amendment it will be found a better working measure than the one previously brought forth and subject to fewer objections.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CARTER. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. After asking a question of the Senator from Montana I will indicate to him what I shall do with my amendment. Assuming it may be true that the board of trustees could invest the savings fund accumulation in mortgages, so that the net interest would be 4 per cent, do you believe it would be the duty of the board so to invest it or put it in a bank at 2½ per cent?

Mr. CARTER. My understanding is that only a certain percentage of such a fund as this could be or should be invested in any safe convertible securities, and at least 50 per cent of the fund would be kept in the banks drawing interest, for the purpose of greater safety.

Mr. CUMMINS. I merely desire to suggest to the Senator that according to the experience of our part of the country there is no other security so quickly and easily convertible into money as a real-estate mortgage. I know the history of a good many of our banks, organized under the State law, and it is their universal experience that in a time of trouble they can get money upon their real-estate mortgages more easily than upon any other securities they have. Therefore I assume that under the bill, if the board of trustees could invest these moneys at 4 per cent or more upon real-estate securities, the board would consider it its duty to do so.

Now, I ask the Senator whether he believes it would be wise for the Government to enter into the business of investing five hundred millions or a thousand millions or fifteen hundred million dollars in real-estate security?

Mr. CARTER. The question is purely academic. It is not within the range of any contemplation or any possibility. I do say to the Senator that so far as the rational administration of the trust might go the board should get as good rates of interest as could be secured without disturbing the current business of the country. I hope to see the time when the rate of interest allowed to depositors in postal savings banks may be increased somewhat over the 2 per cent. The rate we propose to pay is the lowest rate paid by any postal savings bank in the world. I think England comes next with 2½ per cent.

Mr. CUMMINS. One more suggestion, and then I will state what I desire with regard to my amendment.

The Senator from Montana, remembering the experience of a year and a half ago, will, I am sure, understand that this money, in so far as it is deposited in the national banks, notwithstanding the law requiring the retention of a reserve, will rapidly and almost entirely find its way eventually to the great banks in Chicago and New York. He so understands the natural flow and course of our financial affairs, does he not?

Mr. CARTER. I think the country bankers were pretty thoroughly cured in that behalf in 1907. I knew many of them who had ample resources in the banks of New York who were poverty stricken at home and unable to get currency. The tendency toward a central deposit place, I think, is rapidly diminishing.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WARREN. I did not observe that the Senator from Iowa had the floor. I rose to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether it would be agreeable to him for me at this time, or very soon, to call up the agricultural appropriation bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa at present has the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Before the matter is disposed of I desire to suggest to the Senator from Montana that one thing we have labored under as a difficulty in the West is the law which prohibits the loaning by national banks upon farm mortgages. As the Senator from Iowa has well said, in every financial stress in that country the best security, in the last analysis, is the good, safely secured farm mortgage; and if the bill is to go back to the committee for revision, as I understand it is, I suggest to the Senator from Montana the advisability of considering the insertion of a provision in the bill—it would certainly be germane—allowing national banks to make loans on farm lands.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me, upon a reading of the substitute the Senator from Minnesota will perceive that the securities which the board is permitted to take in each State are of the class which the savings banks of the State are permitted to take under state law; and in the main, I think, savings banks take real-estate security.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not believe, and I do not think the Senator believes, that that would repeal the present prohibition against national banks loaning upon real estate. A great deal is said about this board. What I want to suggest is that some provision be put in the bill instead of leaving everything to the board.

Mr. CUMMINS. Having stated the objections I have to the substitute offered by the committee—objections which I think are removed by the amendments I offered to the original bill—but being desirous of getting forward with this measure and, if possible, passing a postal savings bank bill, I withdraw my amendments to the original bill, with the understanding that when the substitute is before the Senate I intend to offer such amendments to section 10 of the substitute as will make it practically the amendment I offered to the original bill.

Mr. CARTER. That leaves the substitute the pending amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa withdraws his amendments.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that under the parliamentary procedure here I shall have an opportunity to do as I suggested.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator will be in order in offering his amendments to the proposed substitute as he suggests.

Mr. CARTER. The parliamentary situation presented is that the substitute is now the pending amendment to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is the pending amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming for the purpose stated by him.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to call up the agricultural appropriation bill, and I wish to say, to be entirely frank, that my purpose is to have it taken up and to dispose of its reading. When that shall have been done, and before proceeding to any of the committee amendments, I will ask that the bill lie over until to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 27053) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Owing to the confusion, I was unable to hear distinctly the announcement of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. My statement was that it is my desire to have the bill taken up now, and that, if the formal reading is demanded, it may be read. But I shall ask that the formal reading be dispensed with; and if that is done, after reading the opening paragraph of the bill, it is my desire that the bill shall lie over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That was the understanding I had with the Senator from Wyoming.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the first formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be read for amendments, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and continued to the end of line 7, on page 1.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the bill may be laid aside; and I give notice that I shall ask that it be taken up immediately upon the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow, subject, of course, to the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore made for to-morrow.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 23, 1909, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 22, 1909.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., delivered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we bless Thy holy name for the great souls whom Thou hast from time to time in the dispensation of Thy providence ushered into life, whose thoughts and deeds have enriched the world and made it a better dwelling place for mankind. Such a soul was our beloved and ever-to-be honored Washington, the "Father of his Country," whose character shines on like the stars in the firmament, growing brighter and brighter as the years come and go; whose deeds grow in magnitude with every coming generation, enlarging their mental vision, opening the way to new possibilities, to greater liberty, and the higher civilization. We thank Thee for his life and deeds, and pray for strength that we may follow his illustrious example and fulfill to a larger degree our mission, and thus glorify Thy name, in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 26915) making appropriations for the army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the army appropriation bill with Senate amendments, disagree to all of the amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the Chair when will be the proper time to enter a point of order against Senate amendments to that bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can hardly conceive of an amendment which the Senate may have placed on the bill that would be subject to a point of order at this time. The Chair would not pass on that. But this is a request for unanimous consent to disagree to all the amendments, and if that consent is given, of course there would be no way to deal with the Senate amendments at this time.

Mr. MACON. If the Chair will refer to Rule XX—I believe it is—he will observe that there is a time when a point of order can be lodged against amendments put upon a House bill by the Senate where the amendments, if offered in the House, would be subject to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware of the rule, but the amendments can not be disposed of on a point of order at this time, if the Chair recollects the practice and the rule.

Mr. MACON. I do not understand all of the practices of the House. I can only read the letter of the rule, and I know the rule makes that provision. Now, what the practice of the House is, and whether this practice has entirely run away with the rule or not, I do not know.

The SPEAKER. Not at all. But this is a request for the unanimous consent to disagree to the Senate amendments and to ask for a conference. That would dispose of one stage of the bill, namely, the present stage. If unanimous consent be given, the Chair would appoint the conferees.

Mr. MACON. I understand, Mr. Speaker, but this is the point that I am trying to get at: Whether or not this point could be lodged after that was done? I have no desire to enter a captious objection to anything that the gentleman from Iowa or any other gentleman of this House has to suggest.

The SPEAKER. So that the gentleman may understand, the Chair would state that this bill would go to the Committee on Military Affairs if the point is made, and when reported by them would go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, provided that there are Senate amendments that make a charge on the Treasury.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I want to say to my friend from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] that while I think no point of order could possibly be raised at this time in the House against any action of the Senate, the House might possibly do so when it comes before the House, so far as to send the bill to the Committee of the Whole. There is a large amount of general legislation on this bill. It is going to take some time to adjust matters, even in the legitimate appropriations. There is a large amount of appropriation in this bill bringing in matters that are entirely foreign to what should be on an appropriation bill. And if it shall go to the conference, I am perfectly willing to say to the House that no action will be taken by the conferees to foreclose the fullest action on the part of the House on all that is new legislation. Now, I would do that if no question had been raised; but at the same time it is exceedingly important, this late in the session, to get these great supply bills in conference as soon as possible. If the Senate conferees recede from this new legislation, that would end it, and then on the legitimate items of increase we can probably come to an agreement that will satisfy every Member of the House who is opposed to legislation on appropriation bills. But I will say to the gentleman that if the Senate conferees will not agree to this, I promise, as one member of the conferees that will be appointed, and I think I voice the sentiment of the other two, that that committee will bring the matter under disagreement so far as legislation is concerned for the House itself to say whether they will agree to it or not. But I do not believe any point of order can be raised.

Mr. MACON. I will read the rule, for the purpose of getting it before the House as it is written.

Any amendment of the Senate to any House bill shall be subject to the point of order that it shall be first considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union if, originating in the House, it would be subject to that point.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is right. I will say to the gentleman he could compel the bill to go to the Committee on Military Affairs. He could then compel the House to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on this matter; and when it was reached in committee I would move the same thing that I do now, and you are then just absolutely at the point that you are on my motion now. If I moved to concur, that would be a different proposition. But I say to the gentleman now that on any new legislation the House shall have ample opportunity to pass upon it.

Mr. MANN. Without being bound up in conference?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Without being bound up in conference.

Mr. MACON. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection and announces the following conferees: Mr. HULL of Iowa, Mr. PARKER, and Mr. HAY.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. MACON. Before that is done I desire to ask the Chair——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York desires to submit a proposition to send a bill to conference.

ADDITIONAL JUDGES, HAWAII.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Mr. Speaker, on House bill 21896 I desire to move that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and that a conference committee be appointed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take the following bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21896) to amend section 86 of an act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, to provide for additional judges, and for other judicial purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what are the amendments of the Senate?

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. This is an omnibus bill, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary last session and passed May 28. There are several amendments to two or three distinct bills and one increase in the salary of a Hawaiian judge.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and announces the following conferees: Mr. JENKINS, Mr. ALEXANDER of New York, and Mr. CLAYTON.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 26916. An act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 7752. An act for the relief of the Boston and Maine Railroad.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 7752. An act for the relief of the Boston and Maine Railroad—to the Committee on Claims.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 26916, the Indian appropriation bill, nonconcur in the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference thereon with the Senate, and appoint House conferees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Indian appropriation bill with Senate amendments, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, the Senate has added a great many amendments to this bill, legislative in their character. Is the gentleman from New York willing to give the same assurance in regard to this bill as was given by the gentleman from Iowa in regard to the army bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not follow what assurance the gentleman from Iowa gave, but I will say to the gentleman that, hurriedly looking over the amendments that the Senate has added to the Indian appropriation bill, I think I can give assurance that the House conferees will most strenuously object to the adoption of most of those amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair announces the following conferees: Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. MARSHALL, and Mr. STEPHENS of Texas.

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Hon. HENRY SHERMAN BOUTELL, of Illinois, read George Washington's Farewell Address.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BOUTELL. I would amend that, Mr. Speaker, by making it the honorable gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want you to read it; you are the best reader in the House. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the gentleman from Illinois be requested to read from the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman will read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BOUTELL read Washington's Farewell Address, as follows:

To the people of the United States:

FRIENDS AND FELLOW-CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those out of whom the choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured that this resolution has not been taken without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service, which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest, no deficiency of respect for your past kindness, but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea. I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove of my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed toward the organization and administration of the Government the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and every day the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that, if any circumstances have given any peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me, and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead—amid appearances sometimes dubious—vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not infrequently want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts and a guaranty of the plans by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave as a strong incitement to unceasing wishes that Heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free Constitution which is the work of your hands may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare which can not end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of our hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence, the support of your tranquillity at home, your peace abroad, of your safety, of your prosperity, of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that from different causes, and from different quarters, much pains will be taken, many artifices employed to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth—as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed—it is of infinite moment that you should estimate the immense value of you national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and to speak of it as a palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest a suspicion that it can in any event be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth or choice of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have in a common cause fought and triumphed together. The independence and liberty you possess are the work of joint councils and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings, and success.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest. Here every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The North in an unrestrained intercourse with the South, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise and precious materials of manufacturing industry. The South, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the North, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the North, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes in different ways to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength to which itself is unequally adapted. The East, in like intercourse with the West in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad or manufactures at home. The West derives from the East supplies requisite to its growth and comfort; and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of the indispensable outlets for its own productions to the weight, influence, and future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interests as one nation. Any other tenure by which the West can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While, then, every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined can not fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations, and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government, which their own rivalships alone would be sufficient to produce but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues would stimulate and embitter. Hence, likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments which, under any form of government, are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the Union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? Let experience solve it. To listen to a mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole with the auxiliary of governments for the respective subdivisions will afford a happy issue of the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who in any quarter may endeavor to weaken its bands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our union, it occurs as matter of serious concern that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations—Northern and Southern, Atlantic and Western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You can not shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heartburnings which spring from these misrepresentations. They tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head. They have seen in the negotiation by the Executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the Senate, of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at that event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the General Government and in the Atlantic States unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties—that with Great Britain and that with Spain—which secure to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, toward confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the Union by which they were procured? Will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute. They must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which alliances in all times have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay by the adoption of a constitution of government better calculated than your former for an intimate union and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This Government, the offspring of your own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself provisions for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political system is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government. But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish government presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations, under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and actions of the constituted authorities are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize factions; to give it an artificial and extraordinary force; to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill-concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government, destroying afterward the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Toward the preservation of your Government, and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect in the forms of the Constitution alterations which will impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what can not be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments as of other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitutions of a country; that facility in changes upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion exposes to perpetual change, from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion; and remember especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests, in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the State, with particular reference to the founding of them upon geographical discriminations. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual, and sooner or later the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purposes of his own elevation on the ruins of the public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight, the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one party against another; foments occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the Government itself through the channels of party passion. Thus the policy and will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This, within certain limits, is probably true; and in governments of a monarchical cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From the natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose; and there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be by force of public opinion to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming it should consume.

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres; avoiding, in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the other, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern, some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way in which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness—these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connection with private and public felicity. Let it be simply asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principles.

It is substantially true that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric? Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements to prepare for danger frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expenses, but by vigorous exertions in time of peace to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives; but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential you should practically bear in mind that toward the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper objects, which is always a choice of difficulties, ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the Government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice toward all nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct; and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt that in the course of time and things the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages that might be lost by a steady adherence to it? Can it be that Providence has connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! it is rendered impossible by its vices.

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations, and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that in the place of them just and amicable feelings toward all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges toward another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur.

Hence, frequent collisions and obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject. At other times, it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to the projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty, of nations has been the victim.

So, likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and the wars of the latter without adequate inducements or justification. It leads, also, to concessions to the favorite nation of privileges denied to others, which are apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate, in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupt, or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation facility to betray or sacrifice the interest of their own country without odium, sometimes even with popularity, gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation to a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils! Such an attachment of a small or weak nation toward a great and powerful one dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter. Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence I conjure you to believe me, fellow-citizens, the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots who may resist the intrigues of the favorite are liable to become suspected and odious, while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war as our interests, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand on foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world, so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than to private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony and a liberal intercourse with all nations are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the stream of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed (in order to give to trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, to enable the Government to support them) conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and natural opinion will permit, but temporary and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another—that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character—that by such acceptance it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not having given more. There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish—that they will control the usual current of the passions or prevent our Nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations. But if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good—that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism—this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far in the discharge of my official duties I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and the other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have at least believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe, my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both Houses of Congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound in interest and duty to take, a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance, and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that according to my undertsanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without anything more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity toward other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me, a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress without interruption to that degree of strength and constancy which it is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortune.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence, and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love toward it which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations, I anticipate with pleasing expectations that retreat in which I promise myself to realize without alloy the sweet enjoyment of partaking in the midst of my fellow-citizens the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors, and dangers.

GO: WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, 19th September, 1796.

[Prolonged applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent to have the Clerk read a short and splendid editorial from the New York American of last Sunday, appropriate to the occasion, on George Washington, entitled "Washington's inspiration." It will only take a few minutes.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not like to object to these things, but there are so many of them——

Mr. SULZER. This will only take a few minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. SULZER. I ask unanimous consent to print the editorial in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to print the editorial in the RECORD.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. What is it proposed to put in the RECORD?

Mr. SULZER. An editorial from yesterday's New York American, entitled "Washington's inspiration."

Mr. MANN. That is all right, but who wrote it?

Mr. SULZER. One of the editorial writers, I presume, on the New York American.

Mr. MANN. I object.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may at this time have read, for information, the order which I send to the Clerk's desk, with a view of asking unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for present consideration of the omnibus claims bill.

Mr. MACON. It is in order to send the omnibus war claims bill to conference.

Mr. PAYNE. I object.

Mr. MACON. I would like to have it read for information. If the gentleman will withhold his objection, he may save time by doing so.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the omnibus claims bill?

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the order for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the request.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That H. R. 15372, commonly known as the "omnibus war claims bill," be taken from the Speaker's table and the Senate amendments thereto disagreed to; that the same be referred to a conference committee, with instructions to insist upon the House disagreement to all the Senate amendments thereto, except such as provide for the payment for property actually taken, destroyed, or used by the Federal Army during the war between the States where claims therefor have been duly referred to the Court of Claims and proper findings had thereon as to the loyalty of the owner and the character and value of the property.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I beg to say to the gentleman that that bill is not on the Speaker's desk at all. It would be impossible to take it from the Speaker's desk. For the present, therefore, I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TAWNEY. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 28245).

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York rises to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know if my request for unanimous consent to print that editorial in the RECORD was objected to?

The SPEAKER. The regular order was demanded.

Mr. SULZER. By whom, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. By the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I did not understand that the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] was objected to, to print the editorial in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. I shall not object, if the gentleman himself wishes to print it as a part of his remarks.

Mr. SULZER. I do.

Mr. MANN. But to print it otherwise——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from New York printing as a part of his remarks the editorial indicated?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say in explanation that this reading of Washington's Farewell Address is a time-honored observance, and I think it is better to keep up the precedent as it has existed, and to read simply George Washington's Farewell Address, and not to couple it with the utterances of editors or of others. I shall therefore object. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The "gentleman from Massachusetts" got up to offer a privileged resolution, and the Chair recognized the gentleman. Then the gentleman from Minnesota arose and without waiting for recognition proceeded to make a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Massachusetts intended to present, not a question of privilege, but a privileged question. The Chair does not recollect whether the gentleman was recognized, but the gentleman from Minnesota rose also to make a privileged motion, and the Chair will have to find out which is of the higher privilege.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, the motion I made to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill was made an hour ago, before the reading of the Farewell Address.

The SPEAKER. And still the Chair will have to ascertain which is of the higher privilege.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Assuming that it is of equal privilege, I beg to bring to the attention of the Chair the fact that I was recognized.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will determine whether it is of equal or higher privilege. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 556.

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be requested to inform the House of Representatives as to the following matters:

(a) What number of aliens were admitted into the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, under the allowed claim of theretofore acquired permanent domicile in the United States.

(b) What number of aliens so admitted would, but for such domicile, have been inadmissible.

(c) What number of aliens during this period were admitted on parole or temporarily.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts intends to follow this with a motion to discharge the committee?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Discharge the committee and ask for immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota is of higher privilege.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman from Minnesota to withhold his motion.

Mr. TAWNEY. In order that we may save time, Mr. Speaker, and get into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the sundry civil bill as soon as possible, I will withhold the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to discharge the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization from the consideration of the resolution which has been read, and agree to the same.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to agree to the resolution. Nobody seems to object to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 28245).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MACON), there were 151 ayes and 10 noes.

Mr. MACON. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. MACON. But we have just had a count.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps some gentlemen did not vote.

Mr. MACON. I can not conceive of a count that would make it more certain than the count we have just had.

The SPEAKER. Some gentlemen did not rise. The Chair will count.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, I think this whole question can be smoothed out without difficulty. The gentleman from Arkansas wants the privilege of speaking ten minutes on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. One hundred and ninety-seven Members present; a quorum. The ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Mr. WATSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill. General debate has been fixed at two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] and one hour by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I now yield one hour to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I have not been a Member of this body long, as terms of service are reckoned here, but I have been a Member long enough to learn that to every Representative in Congress early in his career two methods of progress present themselves—one a particularly easy and pleasant method, the other harder and more difficult. If you select the first and the more easy career, it is only necessary for you to remember that you must not attack wrong in high places if you see it; you must not antagonize great corporations or men of great wealth, unless you do it in general terms. You must absolutely fail to see evidence of individual guilt in public matters, or if you do see it, you must keep still about it. If you pursue this course your stay in Washington will be pleasant and agreeable; White House dinners follow and an entrée into the constantly increasing winter colony of millionaires in this capital city. If you are a lawyer of some experience, this course opens up for you possibilities of lucrative employment and large retainers in New York City at the close of your congressional career, and sometimes even sooner than that.

If, however, you come here with a more serious motive and select the other course, you may expect to encounter difficulties. In the first place, you must not expect to be invited to participate in the social functions of the very rich, even if you would like to be invited. If, in the discharge of your duties under the oath you have taken, you discover and denounce gross improprieties affecting the administration and men in high position, you may expect to be villified, abused, and misrepresented in the editorial columns of the newspapers friendly to the administration, and you must expect to be abused and misrepresented on this floor by the representatives of the interests you attack.

On the 26th day of January I discussed at some length on this floor certain matters pertaining to the Republic of Panama, and the connection of the present administration and its advisers with the same. I followed it up with one or two shorter speeches on the same subject later on, and I have succeeded in bringing upon myself villification, misrepresentation, and abuse, almost without a parallel in the history of this body.

I know now that if you are a Member of Congress you are at liberty to shoot as much as you would like to shoot, provided you do not hit the mark. I succeeded in hitting the mark, and from more than one direction there has gone up a shout of disapproval. Immediately after my speech of January 26 there went up from the present administration signals of distress—violent C. Q. D. signals of distress—and every administration paper seems to have steamed out to the rescue. The approved method of rescue seems to be to launch at me in the editorial columns of these papers the grossest misrepresentation and the vilest abuse. I have been described as violating my privileges as a Member of this body. It is said I got the information and the evidence upon which I based my argument from ex-convicts and blackmailers, and that charge was also solemnly made from this floor by a representative of the interests I assailed. My picture is being printed in many papers with the information that this is the picture of a Member of Congress who is charged with getting his information from ex-convicts and blackmailers. The President of the United States finds it proper to give to the press a letter addressed to the representative of an alleged Republic, in which he refers to me by name and makes a personal attack upon me. The President-elect, hurrying to this capital, heard also the signals of distress, and if he is reported correctly in the newspapers, responded in the same way. If he is correctly reported, and if he referred to me in the speeches he made on his way here, he has grossly misrepresented what I said.

It is the grossest misrepresentation, from whatever source it may come, to say that at any time, in any address, or in any way, I have ever placed myself in opposition to the Panama Canal. In my speech on this floor I simply called attention to certain evidences of graft in connection with our operations there. I have been most loyal at all times to the officials in charge of the work there. True loyalty to this great enterprise means that you must expose and denounce all kinds of graft in connection with it in order to avoid the pitfalls into which the French companies fell, and I propose to do this whether it meets with the approval of the next President of the United States or not.

It has never happened before in the history of the country that a President of the United States has personally assailed and has attempted to belittle a Member of Congress in an alleged diplomatic communication.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is it not also true that it is the first time in the history of the country that such a thing became necessary?

Mr. RAINEY. Such a thing can never be necessary under the Constitution of the United States; and I recommend the reading of that Constitution to the gentleman, and to all of you gentlemen, including the gentleman who has just interrupted me with this insulting question, who upon this floor have resorted in your replies to me to personal abuse, who took advantage of my absence from this city to say upon this floor that which took less courage to say when I was gone than when I was here. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I want to say to every one of them, and to you——

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman making the same remark when these other gentlemen are absent, now, with less courage than if they were present?

Mr. RAINEY. Certainly not. I am talking of when I was away. I want to say you are perfectly safe, all of you. I am not going to retort in kind. I decline to descend to that level of debate in this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If it has happened before, I assert without fear of successful contradiction that it has never before happened that by order of the President the communication was given out to the press for publication in this country. This communication was not intended for Panama. It was intended merely for publication here. It has never happened before that a President-elect, three weeks before his inauguration, has in a public speech assailed any Member of Congress and misrepresented the remarks made by him on this floor.

I did not attack the canal. I am as good a friend of the project as he has ever been. I simply attacked the graft connected with this enterprise there and just now developing; and in this attack I ought to have, as a matter of right, the support and cooperation of the President of the United States and of the President-elect.

I talked for nearly two hours on this floor in discussing these questions without once violating the rules of this House; but the responses made to my speech by the representatives on this floor of William Nelson Cromwell in almost every sentence violated the rules of debate.

I represent here that district in Illinois where the great Lincoln spent his youth and young manhood and the mature years of his life, and on that account I felt it was my duty to leave my work here and go to another city to deliver an address on the occasion of the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of his birth. I had every reason to believe that Congress would adjourn on that day after the morning hour out of respect to his memory. Congress did not adjourn, however, and upon examining the RECORD for that day I find the time was spent eulogizing Lincoln and William Nelson Cromwell and attacking me. The fact that I was going away was well known. The fact that I was going to speak in another city was announced in the Washington papers. The representatives of William Nelson Cromwell, however, selected that occasion to make their attacks on me on the floor of this House. To anyone who reads what they said the reason for the selection of this particular time is apparent—it required much less courage to say what they said about me in my absence than in my presence. They did not abuse and misrepresent me on this floor in the heat of extemporaneous debate. They read, each of them, from manuscript, every word carefully written out. One of them read his speech from manuscript prepared, as he admitted himself, by William Nelson Cromwell.

I want again to say to you who so grossly misrepresented the facts and who so grossly violated the proprieties in your attacks on me that you need not be afraid. I am not going to retort in kind. I decline to descend to that level. I want to say to all those who are spending so much time abusing me that I have not yet even commenced this fight. I have only trained my guns on some of the least objectionable features in connection with Panama matters. But I have caught the enemy unprepared. I have never yet discussed or even remotely referred to my resolution to investigate the Panama Canal purchase and the distribution of the $40,000,000 that of record appears to have been paid to the stockholders of the new French company and to the creditors of the old company. The gentlemen abusing me will evidently exhaust their vocabularies before I reach that matter. But I want now to make myself clearly understood. I want now to say to the President of the United States, who seems at the present time to be reading my speeches; I want to say to the President-elect, and to all these newspapers so anxious to obtain favor with the next administration by abusing me and misrepresenting what I say in their editorial columns; and I want to say to you who have vilified and misrepresented me on this floor that I propose to continue this fight, and you can not stop me by calling me names and by directing at me a system of personal abuse and misrepresentation. I did not come here to represent the interests, and I am not doing it. I am not seeking any sort of recognition at the hands of the winter colony of millionaires in Washington.

I am not asking or expecting employment at the hands of law-defying corporations in New York City when my term of service here has ended. While I am here I expect to discharge my full duty, under my oath, to my district and to my State. The fact that at the very commencement of this fight I have encountered so much and such violent vituperation and abuse convinces me that I am proceeding in the right direction, and makes me more determined than ever to continue the fight to the end. I spoke the truth on this floor on the 26th day of January. They know I did, and you know I did, and now that these replies are all in, I want briefly to examine what I said in the speech I made on that occasion and the evidence I produced in support thereof, in order that the country may know how much of it has been admitted or denied, and how much of it I obtained from ex-convicts and blackmailers.

These abusive speeches had evidently been prepared in advance, expecting me to discuss the resolution I introduced in Congress on the first day of this session.

I have before me here the resolution I introduced on the first day of this session. I expect to print it at this part of my speech. In the limited time I have, it will be impossible for me to read in full documents that I expect to refer to and to read in part, and I ask unanimous consent at this point to insert this resolution and other papers and documents to which I shall refer, either in my speech or in the appendix thereto, and to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, this is the resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five Members of the House be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the purchase by the United States of the Panama Canal property, with the view of ascertaining how much of the $40,000,000 which appears of record to have been paid to the French company was really paid to said company, or for the stock or holdings of said company, or to the French Government for said company; and with a view also of ascertaining how much of said sum, if any, was directly or indirectly paid to American citizens or to an American syndicate; and with a view of ascertaining whether any Member of either branch of the Congress of the United States in an official capacity profited directly or indirectly by said transaction: Provided, That the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses, and also to employ a stenographer and one clerk. Said committee shall report the result of its investigation to the House, with such recommendations as it may deem proper: Provided further, That the expenses incurred hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers approved by the chairman.

I did not discuss this resolution. I did not mention it. I did not refer to it even remotely; and yet the gentlemen attempting to answer me on this floor assume in their speeches that I talked about nothing else, and their arguments—that portion of them not devoted to abuse and misrepresentation of me—simply deal with the canal purchase and the distribution of the $40,000,000. The press agencies of Mr. Cromwell, in the matter they sent out, represent me as talking to my resolution.

I have only commenced the investigation of the subject embraced in this resolution. I have so far refused to discuss it or to mention it in private conversation or on this floor, but I can assure Mr. Cromwell that the time will come when I will discuss it on this floor, and when I do he and his representatives will have something to answer. I am not going to be led now into the discussion of this resolution and the subjects embraced therein.

In my speech of the 26th day of January, and in subsequent speeches, I called attention to the graft which always surrounds great enterprises of this character, and which brought destruction to the French companies, and then I called attention to the fact that we had also commenced to drift in the direction of the rocks upon which the French companies were destroyed, and that already the Canal Zone was being made the dumping ground for property which the owners wanted to sell and for which no other purchaser could be found than the United States. In support of that assertion I discussed the purchase of the Tremont and the Shawmut, and no man has yet denied my statements upon this floor with reference to the purchase of these vessels. In brief, these are the facts I charged, and I did not get my information from ex-convicts and blackmailers. The official records of this Government present all the information I gave to the House in this connection.

The Shawmut and the Tremont were for sale. They were absolutely without value to their owners, a Massachusetts steamship company. They were tied up at the wharf in Seattle, out of commission. The Isthmian Canal Commission in their estimates never asked for the purchase of these vessels, nor of any vessels. This expenditure of money was not contained in the estimates. After the bill in question reached the Senate, an amendment was put on, mandatory in its character, which compelled the Secretary of War to buy these two ships, which permitted him no election, and under that amendment these were the only ships in all the world he could have purchased. It was purely an administration amendment. I undertake to say that no man in this body knew that under it no other ships could be bought. No man in this body dare now make that admission and expect his constituents to return him to the next Congress. Under this amendment over a million dollars was expended for these two particular ships. These are the facts. They can not be denied. I challenge denial on this floor. No man has attempted to deny this. In reply, I am simply charged with obtaining the information upon which I based my speech of the 26th day of January from ex-convicts and blackmailers. A Representative from Massachusetts, upon this floor, gave a certificate of good moral character to a Senator of the United States, insisted that the Boston steamship company had been unfortunate in business, and contended that we may need these vessels for the purpose of carrying cement to the Canal Zone at some time in the future. No other answer has been made or attempted, and I therefore charge this graft upon the administration. With a deficit in the Treasury of $84,000,000, constantly increasing, with the prospect of an expenditure within the next few years of three or four hundred million dollars for canal purposes, out of consideration for a Boston corporation, unfortunate, it is said, in business, we took from the Treasury of the United States, a little over a month ago, over a million dollars and permitted it to be distributed among the stockholders of that corporation. There is no more glaring instance of graft than this in all our history as a Nation.

In my speech I proceeded to show that the statements the President of the United States has made with reference to the Panama Canal have been at times peculiarly inaccurate, and I called attention to his special illustrated Panama Canal message of December 15, 1906, sent to Congress after his return from his visit to the Isthmus. I called attention to the fact that he in that message made the definite statement that the Culebra cut was as wide on the top notch at that time as it would ever be necessary to make it. He also stated that the canal bed in the Culebra cut had at that time been sunk 200 feet below what it originally was, and he also stated that it would be necessary to sink it at that point about 130 feet farther. I referred to these three important misstatements of fact by which the country has been misled. Since I made my speech it is announced that last fall the President himself gave the order to widen the Culebra cut two or three hundred feet, and that order is now being executed. There are Members of this House misled by the statement of the President, who believe that the Culebra cut has been lowered 200 feet from where the French company left it. As a matter of fact, at the time of the President's visit the bed of the cut had not been lowered an inch from where the French left it. In constructing the Culebra cut the French company left narrow embankments of earth extending from one side of it to the other, and upon these embankments their little trains of dump cars were drawn back and forth. These cross embankments were tunneled at the bottom in order to permit the water to run through.

When we commenced our work on the canal, we simply cut out these cross embankments, a work of small importance, and established a system of permanent benches along the sides of the cut. In other respects, at the time of the President's visit to the canal, the canal bed was exactly where the French left it. I did not get my information on this point from ex-convicts and blackmailers. I got my information on this question from a study of the plans and conversations with engineers and others who knew the facts. No man upon this floor has yet ventured to dispute the statement I made as to the inaccuracy of the President. Unless the President's alleged diplomatic letter to the President of the Panama Republic can be accepted as a reference to this part of my speech, there has been no reply from any source. In this letter he simply states that, so far as he has knowledge, my statements are unfounded, and I am quite willing to admit that in this particular the knowledge he possesses is not profound, to say the least.

I called attention in my speech, at great length, to the various conflicting employments of William Nelson Cromwell, the manager and director in fact for the administration of everything pertaining to the Panama Canal. I did not obtain this information from ex-convicts and blackmailers. I obtained it all from statements made by William Nelson Cromwell himself and by Secretary Taft before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and from other public records printed from time to time in Panama matters. The careful digest I made from these sources, showing the conflicting employments of this versatile attorney evidently surprised Mr. Cromwell himself. The compilation had never before been made. No man attempts to deny any of my statements as to his activities, except Mr. Cromwell himself, in the speech read for him on the floor of this House by the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT], to which I shall refer later in my remarks. It remained, however, for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING], a client, as he admitted, of William Nelson Cromwell, to truly represent that gentleman and his methods upon this floor. The gentleman from Massachusetts simply adopted the method of attack used by the press agencies of William Nelson Cromwell, and charged me with obtaining the information upon which I based my speech, first, from the New York World, and, secondly, from ex-convicts and blackmailers.

I have received no information from the New York World, as I stated once before to this same gentleman upon this floor. The subjects which I discussed in my speech of January 26 had never before that time been discussed or mentioned in any newspaper in the United States, and no newspaper in the United States was in possession of the facts or of the evidence I presented; but since I denied on the floor that I received my information from the World, the gentleman has made a discovery, and he read here, at the opening of his speech, an interview with me which, he states, appeared in the New York World on the 22d day of October, 1908. In that interview I appear to have made the statement that I proposed when Congress convened to introduce a resolution for the appointment of a special committee to investigate the charges made by the New York World with reference to the distribution of the $40,000,000 we paid for the canal. I have read the interview placed by the gentleman in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It seems to be substantially correct. I made the same statements, or similar statements, to many reporters about that time at the national Democratic headquarters in Chicago and in other places, and on the first day of the present session I introduced the resolution—the resolution which I have just read in this House, and which I have never discussed and did not refer to in my speech of January 26.

I do not remember to have discussed the matter with any member of the Democratic national committee, and I certainly never received any notice from that organization or from any member of it to the effect that I was expected to introduce this resolution. If the national committee determined to select me to introduce the resolution, they have never yet so advised me. I know of no reason why they should not do so, however, and I know of no reason why I should not have introduced the resolution in question either with or without the consent of the New York World or of the Democratic national committee. I introduced the resolution not knowing that I had been selected by the committee for that purpose, and I do not know it now. The gentleman either did not read my speech of the 26th of January in the RECORD, or if he did read it he has utterly failed to comprehend or understand what I said. In my speech no reference whatever was made to anything contained in my resolution. The argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, however, is this: I told the New York World that I proposed to introduce a resolution to investigate the charges made by that paper. I did introduce such a resolution. I made a speech upon an entirely different subject.

Therefore, my statement on the floor that I did not obtain the information upon which I based my speech from the New York World is untrue. The New York World, he contends, obtained its information with reference to the distribution of the $40,000,000 from ex-convicts and blackmailers. Therefore, he insists, I obtained my information upon which I based my speech of January 26 from the New York World and from ex-convicts and blackmailers. I submit that such profound logic and acute reasoning has never been heard here before. The gentleman from Massachusetts has clearly established himself as the Socrates of this body.

I have never asked the New York World for any information in my canal investigations, and they have never tendered me any. I never asked the New York World for information, simply because I knew that some Representative in Congress unable to rise to the dignity of a more formidable reply to my speech would charge that I got my information from the World, and would think that by making this charge he had answered my speech. In this I have not been disappointed. Mr. Cromwell has found a Member of this body willing to adopt that method of reasoning. I want to say, however, that I know of no reason why I should not get information from the New York World or from any other reliable source. That great paper can take care of itself without any help from me in its present difficulties.

The gentleman from Massachusetts then proceeds at great length to denounce the New York World and to disclose an astounding story of an alleged attempt to blackmail certain persons in the United States, and of an alleged attempt to blackmail Mr. Cromwell, and he proceeds to eulogize Mr. Cromwell. This is absolutely all there is in his speech. He makes no attempt whatever to deny a single fact I stated; he produces absolutely no evidence; there is not a sentence in his entire speech that can by the most violent stretch of the imagination be construed as an answer to anything I said. I know nothing of the matters he mentioned. I never heard until he made his speech that any persons were trying to get Mr. Cromwell to purchase any alleged evidence of the guilt of Mr. Cromwell. I know nothing of any attempts to sell any story to the national Democratic committee. I never heard of such a thing until the gentleman made his speech on this floor. I take it from his speech and from the statement which has since been published by Mr. Cromwell that the evidence to which the gentleman from Massachusetts refers as being concocted by blackmailers had relation to the alleged payment of some part of the $40,000,000 we paid for the canal to an American syndicate. I did not discuss that matter upon this floor, and the mysterious, wonderful method in which the mind of the gentleman from Massachusetts operates is the most astounding thing I have yet encountered in my investigation of matters connected with the Panama Canal.

In my speech, which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING] and others answered, I discussed merely, upon this floor, certain proposed timber legislation in the Republic of Panama and certain proposed railroad legislation there, by which everything of value on one side of the country went to a proposed railroad corporation and everything of value on the other went to a syndicate of Americans. I called attention to the fact that the Amador government refused to give its sanction to the timber contract. I proved by the records made by the present administration in Panama and by the letter of Doctor Amador himself that he refused to sign the timber concession. I insisted that the persons who were interested in the spoliation of Panama evidently induced Secretary Taft to intervene in the recent elections in Panama on behalf of Obaldia. I did not charge that the Secretary of War was a party to this outrageous attempt to despoil the Republic of Panama. In fact, I expressly stated that I did not make that charge. I, however, showed by the evidence—and I published pages of it in the appendix to my speech on that day, January 26—that he did intervene; that he did force the withdrawal of Arias, leaving the field open to Obaldia alone; that on account of his interference Obaldia was elected without opposition; and then I published the official admission of a member of the cabinet of Obaldia, showing that his proper cabinet officer had signed this outrageous timber contract.

I published the evidence he had made himself, to the effect that he tried to force it upon the General Assembly of Panama, and I published in the appendix to my speech pages of evidence in support of my propositions, including an interview with William Nelson Cromwell, which he has never denied, given out to a New York newspaper, in which he most violently rejoiced over the fact that Arias had been forced from the field and that Obaldia would be elected without opposition. I discussed no other matters in my speech. I referred to nothing else. The press agents of Mr. Cromwell and the gentlemen who have spoken upon this floor are only attempting to throw dust on the issues I raised and to obscure the evidence I presented by setting up straw men here in this House and then knocking them over.

In my speech I said I did not know who was back of Randolph G. Ward in his railroad operations. I do not know now, but I commented upon the entire harmony with which both plans were proceeding as indicating a possible agreement between the promoters of each. The anxiety displayed by William Nelson Cromwell and by others to escape the charge of even of the remotest connection with either of these schemes is absolute proof of the infamous character of both projects and makes it unnecessary for me to discuss or to explain further the provisions of either of them.

All the evidence I produced in support of my assertions is printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, immediately following my speech of January 26. A casual examination of it by any person of only a moderate degree of industry ought to establish the fact that I have made out my case. In the appendix to my speech I stated the origin of the evidence I presented, and told where it came from and where I obtained it. I obtained it nearly all from the Isthmus of Panama, open letters and documents, many of them published in the Spanish editions of the papers there, and translated by competent persons at my expense. If those editors of administration papers throughout the country who are abusing me and misrepresenting the source of my information, were possessed of the slightest degree of industry and fairness, they could find the source of my information by examining the appendix to my speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I regret that I am not able financially to have this great mass of evidence printed and sent out to the thousands of persons who have written to me requesting me to send it to them. A Member of Congress can have such documents printed only at his own expense. This fact is not generally known. I have back of me no great corporations, no men worth millions, who are assisting me in the fight I am making. I regret exceedingly that I am unable to comply with the requests upon me for copies of my speeches on this question and for copies of the appendix to the same. I can not even undertake, with the limited means I control, to employ stenographers to answer the letters I have received and am receiving, and for that reason I am apparently discourteous to many hundreds of earnest, honest citizens of the United States.

In my speech I called attention to a secret meeting of a few members of the General Assembly of Panama on a Sunday night in December last, behind locked doors and armed guards, in the palace of the President in Panama. The fact that this meeting was held was not even known in the city of Panama until I made my speech, and I am somewhat surprised to learn, from the cable message made public here on February 12, that any who attended that meeting had even admitted that such a meeting was held. I did not expect these men, secretly assembled in a Spanish-American Republic in the nighttime, protected by armed guards, to admit the purpose for which they were there. I said that at that meeting the statement was made that the men who were back of John Ehrman and his timber enterprise were William Nelson Cromwell, Roger L. Farnham, his confidential clerk, W. S. Harvey, and one other gentleman, whose denial I myself read on this floor, and whose enthusiastic repudiation of everything and everybody connected with the scheme I have not the slightest desire to controvert, as I have before stated upon this floor. I do not have the slightest doubt as to the fact that his name was used there absolutely without his consent. I shall not refer to him again in this connection.

I also produced and printed on page 1436 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an official declaration issued by Ramon M. Valdes, a member of the cabinet of Obaldia, dated January 2, 1909. In order that I may not be charged with obtaining it from ex-convicts and blackmailers, I will say that I found it in the Spanish edition of the Diario, a newspaper published on the Isthmus of Panama, of January 4, 1909, and had it translated by a competent person. In this letter he officially states that the persons interested in the contract are Messrs. W. S. Harvey, Alfred E. Drake, and Jonas E. Whitley, of the United States. Therefore the men who are charged on the Isthmus with being back of this proposed contract are William Nelson Cromwell, Roger L. Farnham, Alfred E. Drake, Jonas E. Whitley, and W. S. Harvey. Of the five gentlemen I have mentioned William Nelson Cromwell is the only one who has at any time made any denial of his alleged connection with the enterprise, in spite of everything that has been said in the newspapers to the contrary. I regret exceedingly that under the evidence I propose now to present I can not accept his denial. I do not know any of these gentlemen. I have never, to my knowledge, seen any of them. Some days have elapsed now since my speech of January 26. They have all had ample opportunity to deny their connection with this enterprise, and those who have not denied their connection with it must now be assumed to have admitted the same. All of the gentlemen I have mentioned, except Mr. Cromwell, are exceedingly unimportant.

It is only their relation to Mr. Cromwell that makes them at all important in this connection.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. If it does not disturb the gentleman from Illinois, will he tell me whether he has already given to the House in his former speech, which I did not hear, or whether he proposes now to give us the source of his own information that this meeting was so secretly conducted, in order that we may judge of its reliability?

Mr. RAINEY. I am proceeding with the discussion of that matter now. This leaves connected with this proposition the five gentlemen whose names I have read. Now, I want to call attention to the fact, in spite of everything that has been said in the columns of the newspapers to the contrary, that only one of these gentlemen has denied his connection with it.

It becomes necessary now to find out just who Mr. Roger L. Farnham is, and in order that I may not be charged with obtaining my information on this point from ex-convicts and blackmailers, I will read now from the statement made by William Nelson Cromwell before the Senate committee. On the 9th day of May, 1906, Mr. Cromwell testified before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and I read from these hearings, volume 4, Senate Document 401, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, page 3075. Mr. Cromwell was being examined by Senator Morgan as to the effect of the appointment of his clerk, Mr. Farnham, as a director of the railroad company.

Senator MORGAN. That is all right. Now, answer the question. Could your clerk, Farnham, in the case of an equal division among the board of directors, turn you out of that position or keep you in, at his pleasure?

Mr. CROMWELL. Mr. Farnham, like myself, would act upon his judgment as a director, and be responsible for it.

Senator MORGAN. Has he the power, under the by-laws and charter, to turn you out of that executive committee?

Mr. CROMWELL. You mean, sir, in the contingency mentioned of a tie vote?

Senator MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. CROMWELL. He would have the power, as a director.

Senator MORGAN. He is still your clerk?

Mr. CROMWELL. He is still in the service of my firm, of course.

Senator MORGAN. On a salary?

Mr. CROMWELL. Certainly.

Senator MORGAN. How much salary does he get?

Mr. CROMWELL. I think it is $3,500.

Senator MORGAN. How long has he been in that situation?

Mr. CROMWELL. A good many years.

Senator MORGAN. How many years?

Mr. CROMWELL. I have already testified about it. I think it is ten years or more.

Senator MORGAN. About how many years?

Mr. CROMWELL. I think it is over ten years, speaking from memory.

I submit that a man who has been working for so many years on a salary of $3,500 per year would not be of much financial assistance in a project of this character.

In order to show who Mr. E. A. Drake is and in order at the same time not to be charged with obtaining my information from ex-convicts and blackmailers, I read from a letter addressed to me from the office of the Isthmian Canal Commission of the 8th day of February of this year. With reference to Mr. Drake, they say:

In addition to being a director of the Panama Railroad Company he is vice-president of that company, having been elected to that position on April 1, 1907. Prior to that time he was secretary and treasurer of the company for many years, and he was also appointed assistant to the president on April 2, 1906.

I might add that he is regarded in railroad circles as being Cromwell's man in railroad matters, and they have always been closely associated. Now, bearing in mind the fact that neither of these gentlemen has at any time denied his connection with the proposed timber contract, I want to read a letter from Doctor Amador, the ex-President of Panama, written to President Obaldia and dated December 31, 1908. It was given out for publication by Obaldia himself, and published in the Panama Journal on January 5, 1909, and in the Diario on January 4, 1909. I presume, therefore, that no one will charge me with getting this information from an ex-convict or blackmailer. I clipped it myself from these papers and had it translated. I have already published it in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this session, on the 26th day of January, 1909, at pages 1435 and 1436. In the letter ex-President Amador discusses his refusal to sign the timber contract in question, and says:

This contract was proposed to me after an opinion had been given on it by a Panamanian lawyer, who, I believe, was Dr. Ramon M. Valdes, now secretary of state.

Manuel Obaldia was only present on one of the many interviews I had with the interested parties.

Mr. Drake, a man whom I highly esteem, spoke to me very little about the contract, confining himself to showing me its legality and advantages.

It was Mr. Farnham who, on many accounts, insisted that I should make the contract, assuring me in a short time he and his family would be very rich.

I never told anyone that a sum of money was offered to me, and this is what several persons have asked me and what I have always said.

Will Mr. Farnham explain why he and his family would be very rich in a short time if Doctor Amador signed this contract Can Mr. Drake explain his interest in the matter? The time to deny Doctor Amador's statement is now, while the old gentleman is still living. His health is in a precarious condition, and the announcement of his death may be made at any time. It will not be safe for these gentlemen to deny their connection with this matter until after his death.

I do not know who Jonas E. Whitley is, except from information he has given out to the reporters in New York City, who are watching and reporting the proceedings connected with the libel suits brought against the New York World. I hope I will not be charged with obtaining this information from ex-convicts and blackmailers. The Associated Press reports, published in the papers of the 29th day of January of this year, contain this statement:

Another visitor received by Mr. Jerome yesterday was Jonas Whitley, a representative of William Nelson Cromwell, who was one of the early witnesses called before the federal grand jury in Washington.

In the same connection, and corroborating this statement, the New York Times on the same day contained this item:

Jonas Whitley, an associate of William Nelson Cromwell, was another caller at Mr. Jerome's office yesterday in connection with the Panama case.

I might add that the name of Mr. Jonas E. Whitley is indorsed as a witness on the back of the indictments just returned against the New York World and the Indianapolis News. I could probably find a similar item in every New York paper of that date, as reported by other reporters. The reporters covering this investigation at that time evidently got this information from Mr. Whitley himself.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know who Mr. W. S. Harvey is. I am not at all interested in ascertaining who he is. I only know that he is a man of no importance, and it is not necessary for him or for any Member of this body to insert in the RECORD here an expurgated letter from him abusing and criticising me.

Mr. McCREARY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. McCREARY. I want to state to the gentleman that Mr. W. S. Harvey is a man of high character and position in the city of Philadelphia. He is the president of the Philadelphia Museums, a man of considerable importance, a man of character.

Mr. RAINEY. If he is president of the museum, it might be proper for him to go there himself. He might, so far as I know, make the most excellent freak they have. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Excluding Mr. Harvey, has the gentleman been able to find out where these other three or four men lived before they went into this Panama undertaking?

Mr. RAINEY. They live in the United States.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. In New York City?

Mr. RAINEY. I think the most of them in New York City; I think all of them. I am not after Mr. Harvey, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I am sorry that he got caught in my net. I am after bigger fish than the president of a museum in Philadelphia.

Mr. McCREARY. I want to say to the gentleman that it is a commercial museum for the development of the products of other countries brought into this country, and is not a museum of funny things.

Mr. RAINEY. Then his presence in that museum would be absolutely out of place.

Mr. McCREARY. It is a museum of business and he is a business man, and he certainly would have come here——

Mr. RAINEY. I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. McCREARY. I am not making a speech.

Mr. RAINEY. I am not after Mr. Harvey; I am after bigger men.

As I said, this leaves only W. S. Harvey, who, although at first he denied his connection, through his stenographer, with the timber contract, now admits the same. I know nothing at all about him except that he is a man of no importance. I care nothing for his expurgated letter assailing me, which has been read into the RECORD, nor do I care to make any reply to the same. I am not after him at all. I am after more important persons than he will ever be. I am sorry he got caught in my net. I am trying hard for larger fish. If I knew the man higher up, represented by him, I would probably have some valuable information.

This completes the list. These are the only men I have ever claimed the evidence I have submitted connects with this enterprise, except one whose denial I have stated I will not controvert. Of these four, one is Mr. William Nelson Cromwell's private secretary, one is his railroad representative, and one is his associate and business representative. I regret that I know nothing about the fourth gentleman I have mentioned. None of them have any money with which to handle an enterprise involving the expenditure of a million dollars or more for roads and the removal of the timber from half the public land in Panama in sixty years. The only man among the five of any financial responsibility is William Nelson Cromwell. He boasted before the Senate committee recently that he had more money than he needed, and that he controlled $100,000,000 worth of money and securities.

Under the evidence I have presented, I submit that his denial is not of as much value as his representatives on this floor claim for it. I respectfully submit that he has not escaped and he will not be able to do so.

Of the gentlemen I have mentioned, Mr. Drake will be particularly valuable to Mr. Cromwell. His connection with the railroad makes it possible for him to obtain most valuable information with reference to the timber resources of Panama. The Isthmian Canal Commission in its report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, announced that they proposed to commence surveys. I quote from their report:

> To embrace the entire watershed of the Chagres extensive surveys of the upper valley will be necessary, and it is anticipated that this work will be accomplished during the current year.

This survey will, of course, embrace the entire Atlantic Ocean side of the Republic of Panama from Colon to the boundary line of Colombia. With Mr. Drake in his official position, it is easy to see that Mr. Cromwell will have always advance information with reference to the timber supply on this vast area of territory, but perhaps even without Mr. Drake he would be able to get the information he wants. His influence seems to have been always all powerful with the present administration in Panama matters, and it is probable he will exert about the same influence on the next administration.

In making this reply I am compelled to answer, not a speech made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT], but a speech made by William Nelson Cromwell himself, and simply read on this floor by the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT], as he himself acknowledged in his remarks. The speech in the main is a defense of the Panama Canal purchase and the distribution of the $40,000,000 we paid for it. These matters I propose at some future time to discuss on this floor. I have not yet even referred to them, although I have spent much time investigating them. A large portion of his speech is taken up with a defense of his administration of the funds of the Panama Republic in New York. I did not challenge this. So far as I know now, his administration of these funds may be all he claims for it. I have not as yet gone into the questions he discussed.

I want to call attention to the fact that, although at great length I stated Mr. Cromwell's various conflicting professional employments—his prosecution of bogus claims against this Government while occupying an advisory position, and being, in fact, an officer of this Government; the frauds he practiced upon this Government while managing the railroad after we had, in fact, purchased the property and before its delivery—he has not denied a thing I said in this connection except to say that he and his clerk, Mr. Farnham, and Obaldia are not just at the present time directors of the Panama Railroad Company. His denial in this particular is weakened by the fact that he admits they were all directors of that company, and he was general counsel of the company when the acts I complained of occurred.

I also charged that while he was counsel for the Panama Railroad Company he also occupied the absolutely conflicting position of being of counsel for Mr. Harriman and his transcontinental railroad lines. In Mr. Cromwell's speech he denies that (I quote his words) he acted as counsel for "the transcontinental roads under Mr. Harriman's control." This evasive denial makes it necessary for me to state just what his official position was with reference to the Harriman interests. He was counsel for the steamship lines owned by Mr. Harriman and operated by him between our Pacific ports and the Pacific Ocean terminal of the Panama Railroad, and used by Mr. Harriman as a means of regulating transcontinental freight rates, so as to avoid any competition the Panama Railroad and the steamship lines might otherwise be able to present. This employment was more inconsistent with the position he then held as general counsel for the Panama Railroad and steamship lines than any other Harriman connection he might have had.

Mr. Cromwell, like all of his defenders speaking on this floor, occupies his time discussing things I did not mention, and denying things I did not say. The effort is to obscure the issue I raised here on the 26th day of January in my speech, and to create the impression that answers have been made to the proof I presented in connection with my speech.

Mr. Cromwell insists that he never met Obaldia until that gentleman came to Washington as the representative here of the Republic of Panama, but in the same article, read by the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT], he exhibits a remarkable knowledge of the personal history of Obaldia and of his career in the Colombian Senate, to which I referred in my speech.

I did not expect Obaldia to agree with me in my estimate of him, and I am not surprised that he has failed to do so. The only answer he makes, however, to my speech is contained in his telegram to his son, Manuel Obaldia, in New York City, who is the same Manuel Obaldia implicated by Doctor Amador in his letter, a part of which I have read, in the timber frauds on the Isthmus of Panama. In his telegram to Manuel Obaldia, President Obaldia merely states that his attitude while in the Colombian Congress and his entire public life are far beyond the reach of slanderers. He continues by stating that the timber contract and the railway proposition have both been rejected, and that there is a bill under consideration regulating forest exploitation on the entire Atlantic coast, including the Chagres Valley. This telegram from Obaldia is accepted as proof positive that my charges were unfounded, and that Obaldia himself is opposed to the effort to steal the forests of his country. On the contrary, the proof I have already presented shows that he favored it; that the proper cabinet officer signed the proposed contract; and that his administration tried to compel the general assembly to approve the same.

I published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on January 26, at pages 1435 and 1436, a letter from a prominent citizen of Panama, Santiago de la Guardia, addressed to the President of Panama, protesting against the contract we are discussing. The letter is dated December 29, 1908. I did not obtain it from any blackmailer. I copied it from the Panama Daily Star and Herald of January 3, 1909. Referring to the timber contract in this letter, La Guardia says:

I am going to speak about the contract that a foreign syndicate wants to obtain in order to get a wide, a new, and very big zone of our territory to exploit for fifty years—the woods of our Atlantic coast. This syndicate is represented by two of our countrymen, whom it is not necessary to name. They want this contract not for themselves, but to give it to other men. But it would be better that if they get it it were for them, because this grace, that may better be called national disgrace, would so remain within the family and would not inherit the danger of diplomatic reclamations, so terrible for weak countries.

That contract was born with the stigma, with the I. N. R. I. of dishonor in its pasteboards.

Here is, yet alive, the respectable old gentleman who preceded you in the supreme command. He is near to the tomb. But he will be covered by his sweat cloth at the same time that with the nimbus of having returned the infamous proposal with which he was tempted. There is also, full of youthfulness and life, the present deputy and secretary of public works at the same time. He can inform you that he was the messenger with whom the ex-President Amador sent back the papers of the infamous offer.

The population is alarmed, is indignant at the notice of the monstrous contract which despoils and insults us.

Ramon M. Valdes, secretary of state, on behalf of Obaldia, answered the above letter. The answer was printed in the Diario, of Panama, on January 4, 1909. I obtained it from that paper and published it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page 1475. This letter defends the proposed timber contract. Referring to the charge that the promoters of the enterprise during Amador's administration tried to bribe Amador, Valdes states in this letter:

But I can well say, in meditating and thinking over these things, that we should be assured that if there had been any attempt of bribery with Doctor Amador, how can that occasion any doubt as to the honor of the men who are to-day in the government, and what relation can their conduct have with an action performed by a government now out of power, and how can you believe, General, that this supposed attempt at corruption ought to enforce the abandonment of a matter that possesses such favorable aspects for the material development of the country? You can give no sufficient reasons in support of your ideas.

* * * * * * *

As a member of the government, I favor the projected operation, because I think it advantageous for the country, and because I am inspired by the natural zeal of the administration, of which I form a part, to free itself from the sin of indolence which I attribute to the past administration, in all things related to the progress of our Republic.

On January 15 the Panama Journal, on the front page, in discussing the lumber contract, makes this statement. I quote from the Journal on that date:

Interest in the lumber contract signed between the secretary of the treasury, Carlos A. Mendoza, and Mr. John Ehrman is steadily growing. The very able report presented to the National Assembly by the committee appointed to inquire into the pros and cons of the question has done much to remove the misunderstanding that had been created as to the real aims of the contract.

And again, on the 18th day of January of this year, the same paper, the organ of the administration in Panama, contains the following statement on the first page, which I read:

The lumber contract signed between the secretary of the treasury, Carlos A. Mendoza, and Mr. John Ehrman has raised a storm of unreasoning protest from a number of possibly well-meaning but certainly ill-informed gentlemen, who are apparently blind to its many and undoubted advantages.

The same paper, in the same issue, also contains the following statement:

There was an interesting session of the National Assembly Friday afternoon to discuss the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the lumber contract between the secretary of the treasury and Mr. John Ehrman. * * * Dr. Carlos A. Mendoza, in a most earnest and forceful speech, retraced the history of the lumber contract. * * * And the speaker, his voice ringing with emotion, declared that he gave way to no one in his love for his country, and that he had been guided solely by the purest patriotism and most ardent desire to benefit the Republic when he had signed the contract, which he firmly believed would be of untold, incalculable advantage to Panama.

In connection with the above extracts I have read from the Panama Journal, and in order to show the method adopted by the Obaldia government to compel the approval of the contract signed by Obaldia's ministers, I read now from an open letter written by an American, printed both in Spanish and in English, and distributed generally throughout the city of Panama and the Republic of Panama. So far as I have been able to ascertain—and I have read, I think, every issue of all the Panama papers from the date this letter was circulated until the present time—the statements contained in it have never been denied by any administration papers in the Republic of Panama, nor by anyone else. You may therefore at this time, I think, accept it as true. I read from the letter:

ANCON, January 18, 1909.

The evil that men do lives after them.—Shakespeare.

SANTIAGO DE LA GUARDIA.

SIR: Saturday I witnessed the peculiar spectacle of a "popular" government passing, or attempting to jam through, an unpopular measure by the aid of the "big stick," in the shape of policemen's clubs in the hands of the police force—packing the capitol building with policemen to prevent any popular demonstrations on the part of the unwilling public. This is the method of darkest Russia; it is worthy of Gabrera or of Castro; but Castro, with all his faults, was rabidly and at times unreasonably patriotic, and many of his troubles came from that very virtue. He would not allow thieving foreign syndicates nor unscrupulous promoters to grab the territory of the Republic. We do things better in the States. When we wish to put through one of those thieving bills—such as a franchise bill, for illustration—we chloroform the general public; you club them into insensibility with a policeman's club if they object. Our system has several advantages over yours. It is almost a pleasure to be robbed in the States. There the public suffers no pain from the operation. Your system is too crude and primitive, compared with ours, but as you are adopting many of our ideas, no doubt you will also conform to our methods of graft.

* * * * * * *

This contract has against it two points. First, it creates a monopoly, giving one-half of the Republic to one company. Second, it would destroy the timber with no adequate means for replacing it. The effect of this would be most detrimental to the country in every way. The land of the world is passing fast enough into the possession of syndicates and great land speculators. Its effect and tendency is to create a peasant and tenant class of farmers. No government which gives any heed to the warnings of history and which attempts to profit by the teaching and lessons of experience should attempt to concentrate its land in the hands of a few men. * * *

WILSON.

This letter is an interesting document, and throws considerable light on the methods used by Obaldia in keeping his contract with the American syndicate.

After I made my speech of the 26th day of January, Manuel E. Amador, a son of ex-President Amador, sent a telegram to Mr. Santiago de la Guardia, at Panama. I have never seen the telegram, but I read now an extract from the Panama Star and Herald of February 1, 1909. Although I am giving the sources of my information very definitely and am producing here on the floor the papers from which I am reading, I have not the slightest doubt but that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING] will insist that I am getting my information from blackmailers and from ex-convicts. I read now from the Panama Star and Herald of February 1, 1909:

A telegram from New York, addressed to Mr. Santiago de la Guardia, by Mr. Manuel E. Amador, son of ex-President Dr. Amador Guererro and ex-consul-general of Panama in New York, reads as follows:

"To-day's dailies are full of horrid sentiments against the Panama Government. The former administration was praised in a speech made in the House of Representatives denouncing the cession of the forests. The national honor demands the rejection of the contract before Taft's arrival."

The last paragraph is full of significance.

The cable messages received from Panama during the recent visit of Secretary Taft to that country do not indicate that he was particularly active in defeating the timber proposal. The only thing he apparently did was to tell the citizens of Panama to pay no attention to sensational statements and speeches made in the United States.

On the 29th day of January I published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 1641, a dispatch from the special correspondent of the New York Herald to that paper. The dispatch is dated at Panama, January 27, 1909, the day after I made my speech. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 1641:

Panama is in a ferment of excitement on account of the project of the present administration to make what is termed "a gift" of the entire Caribbean coast of the republic to an American syndicate. President Obaldia has sent two special appeals to the Chamber of Deputies urging the ratification of the timber concession, and the result has been the stormiest sessions held by the legislative body since it came into existence.

* * * * * * *

There is a grave question now whether the concession will be ratified. It is the pet measure of President Obaldia.

* * * * * * *

The concession has been designated on the Chamber floor as the "Cromwell grant."

* * * * * * *

Speakers have sarcastically inquired why the Government does not find another set of Americans and grant them the Pacific slope of the Republic, so as to complete the transaction at the same time and have each company administer affairs on its own side under Mr. Cromwell's guidance.

I am wondering if the mental processes of the gentleman from Massachusetts are still leading him to the conclusion that I obtained and am obtaining my information from blackmailers.

Obaldia, in his telegram which has been read into the RECORD, announces that the "Amador-Arias government was not overthrown, but after expiration of the constitutional term was defeated in free elections." The mental processes of President Obaldia are quite as remarkable as the mental processes of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING].

I have already placed in the RECORD four columns of evidence on this question, and I have printed it on pages 1432, 1433, and 1434 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The evidence I have printed shows that from 600 to a thousand marines, perhaps more than that, were sent to the Isthmus of Panama just before the elections by the President of the United States. The Tacoma and the Prairie were sent to Panama. The battle ships New Hampshire and Idaho were ordered to leave for Panama—all just before the elections. Some of the evidence I have presented shows that the intention at one time was to assemble there a force of 1,800 marines in the latter part of June and the first part of July. The elections occurred on the 12th of July.

On the 28th day of June the battle ship New Hampshire and the battle ship Idaho arrived at Colon with large contingents of marines on board. The dispatches from Panama on that day show that the cruiser Prairie was already there, with a full complement of men. The dispatches show that on the 30th day of June the Tivoli Hotel was filled with army officers of high rank, and I have printed their names on page 1473 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. They registered, all of them, as private citizens, and asked that their identity be not made known. On the same page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I printed extracts from the official letter of William H. Taft, written while he was on the Canal Zone on the 18th day of May, 1908, and published in the Panama Star and Herald of June 22, 1908, threatening intervention and proposing to station two Americans at each polling place in the Republic; in other words, proposing that the election be held with American soldiers and marines, friendly to Obaldia, at every polling place.

Mr. Squires, our minister there, was favorable to the Amador party prior to the election, until he was summoned to the United States. After he had reported to Mr. Root and to Mr. Taft, according to the Panama Star and Herald of July 20, 1908, he went back to the Isthmus an almost open supporter of Obaldia.

On the 6th day of July, 1908, Arias withdrew his candidacy. I published his letter of withdrawal in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 1434. Referring to Mr. Taft's intervention, in his letter of withdrawal, Señor Arias says—and I read now from his letter:

> These events plainly demonstrate the imminent peril of the military occupation of this country by forces of the United States of America, the which will be a death blow to our national life. The whole country understands how inevitable this is, and what grave peril it involves, and for this reason it behooves us to avoid at all cost even the remotest probability of having to lament irremediable evils.
> Therefore, after the most mature reflection, and guided solely by what I consider my patriotic duty, I have decided to present to you, as I now do present it, my renunciation of the candidacy for the presidency of the Republic, with which you have honored me, and to which afterwards have adhered spontaneously and disinterestedly the majority of the liberal and conservative Chiriquins and a considerable number of both parties in the other provinces of the Republic.

Commenting upon the withdrawal of Arias, the Panama Star and Herald, in its issue of July 6, 1908, prints an editorial, which I have reproduced at page 1474 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and from which I now read in part:

> The result of the action of Mr. Arias may mean the loss to the country of a firm and capable ruler. * * * By his renunciation the country loses, but if his continuance in the race would bring about the irreparable disaster which now threatens, the country is even more indebted to him for his unselfish action. * * * We can but express the hope that the patriotic action of Mr. Ricardo Arias and the Constitutional party may yet be the means of averting the loss of independence, which now threatens the Republic.

Immediately following the withdrawal of Mr. Arias, Mr. William Nelson Cromwell exultingly gave out to the New York Herald the interview which I have printed at page 1474 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and which I will now read. I hope that Mr. Cromwell's representatives on this floor will not charge me with obtaining it from blackmailers. It was published in the New York Herald on the 6th of July, 1908, two days after the withdrawal of Arias. This interview shows the interest Mr. Cromwell had in the withdrawal of Arias. I read now from the article in the New York Herald.

> William Nelson Cromwell expressed the greatest gratification to-day when he learned from a Herald correspondent that Secretary Arias had withdrawn as a candidate for the presidency of the Republic of Panama, leaving the way clear for Don Domingo Obaldia.

And I also published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 26, on page 1474, the farewell message of President Amador to the General Assembly of Panama on the 1st day of September, 1908. I read only a part of it:

> The results of that electoral investigation, as you well know yourselves, proved how exaggerated the charges against this Government had been, as made by William H. Taft, who was then the Secretary of War of the United States. * * * Nevertheless, the situation, as created by that memorandum and the subsequent measures which threaten seriously the very existence of the Republic, forced one of these great parties to leave the field in an absolute and patriotic manner, so that the returns of the polling places have not made known the will of the people.

The answer, of course, to all the proof I have presented and am presenting now on these questions simply is that I have received my information from blackmailers. Under these circumstances I submit that even the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING], with his wonderful reasoning powers, will not be able to show that Mr. Arias was defeated in a free election. With American troops at the polls, and with no opponent at all in the field against Obaldia, his election as President of Panama ought not to occasion much surpise. The proof I have presented shows that an honest old Spanish-American statesman, Doctor Amador, refused to sanction the concessions to which I have called attention.

The proof shows that Secretary Taft was in some way induced to intervene in the elections; that he did force one of the parties from the field; that the Amador government, which had refused these concessions, was defeated. Obaldia and his ministers immediately signed the timber contracts which I have been discussing, and which it seems I have succeeded temporarily in defeating in the Republic of Panama. The defeat, however, is only temporary. I understand from the Panama papers which have just reached Washington that the proposition now is to submit the proposed Ehrman contract to the highest bidder; in other words, to sell all of the forests on the Atlantic Ocean side of Panama to those persons who are willing at a public letting to pay the most for them. Mr. Cromwell and his followers are in possession of about all the information there is as to the value of these properties. There is no one to bid against them. The scheme to despoil the Republic of Panama is only made more complete by the proposition now before the General Assembly.

I have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 1478, a remarkable compilation, made at my request by the Bureau of Forestry, showing the timber resources of Panama. It is remarkable that upon a subject so little understood in this country so much information can be collected. This compilation furnishes conclusive evidence as to the value of the Bureau of Forestry and the thorough work they are capable of doing. There is enough, evidently, known about the forests of Panama to indicate that their value is simply incalculable. I published enough information to show that the forests of Panama sought by these Americans may, in the near future, almost approach in value the entire forest resources of the public lands of continental United States. Imagine, if you can, the effect that would be produced in this country if Congress should pass an act putting up for sale to the highest bidder all the forests on all the public lands of the United States.

The effect of my speech of January 26, I know, is only temporary, but temporarily at least I have succeeded in protecting Obaldia's native country from him.

I think I am justified in calling attention to the unfair tactics adopted by my opponents on this floor and by the press bureaus of Mr. Cromwell. My speech absolutely remains unanswered. Mr. Cromwell's representatives on this floor and his press bureaus were prepared for another and a different kind of a speech. Their guns were loaded for that. The attack I made was entirely unexpected, and the next attack I propose to make on these gentlemen will be just as entirely unexpected by them when it comes. They were prepared to answer any speech I made on the resolution I introduced providing for an investigation into the distribution of the $40,000,000 we paid for the canal, but they were prepared only to answer that by a system of personal abuse and misrepresentation. I did not make the speech they expected me to make, nor refer in any way to my resolution. They, however, treated the matter as though I had made it, and posed before the country as having answered everything I said by simply answering a supposed speech that I had not made upon this floor. I want to assure these gentlemen that at some future time I do propose to discuss my resolution and to discuss the question as to what has become of the $40,000,000, and when I do discuss it on this floor I will give Mr. Cromwell and his representatives and his press bureaus something to answer.

In my experience in the practice of the law, which covered a period of nearly twenty years, while I never had much to do with the criminal practice, I had many opportunities to observe the methods of criminal lawyers. The method of defending a criminal when all other methods fail is simply to bring before the jury witnesses who will testify to his previous good character. The gentlemen who have replied to me on this floor in such numbers have simply become character witnesses for William Nelson Cromwell and others. Several of them, standing here on this floor, tearfully referred to Douglas Robinson and insisted that I had made an attack upon his reputation. I have never mentioned him in any of my speeches. I had forgotten his very existence until these gentlemen referred to him so feelingly.

I have stated that there is one gentleman I shall not refer to again. His repudiation of the whole thing and of everybody connected with it has entirely disarmed me. He is the only gentleman, however, whose name I do not propose to mention again in connection with this and with other matters that I propose to discuss hereafter.

I insist that the proof I have submitted to-day and heretofore, which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, sustains fully the charges I have made.

Now, to show that William Nelson Cromwell's hand is still uplifted against the Treasury of the United States, and in order to show that he is engaged at the present time in an indefensible attempt to betray and to further despoil the Republic of Panama, which he claims to be representing here in a position of trust and confidence, I want to refer to some other matters. I presume that this portion also of my speech will be answered by the production of some additional character witnesses, and by further statements to the effect that I am obtaining my information from blackmailers and from ex-convicts.

Mr. Cromwell, in the speech made by him through the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT] on this floor, has seen fit to discuss his present efforts to conclude a treaty between Colombia and Panama, in which he refers to the necessity for some contribution from Panama to Colombia as her proportion of the public debt of Colombia, and I want to refer now briefly to the proposed Cromwell treaties. I read now from a dispatch signed by Cromwell and Arosemena, dated at Washington, D. C., on January 10 of this year, which was published in the Panama Star and Herald of the 18th day of January of this year. The dispatch is addressed to Obaldia and reads as follows:

All three treaties signed at midnight, and we rejoice at this happy conclusion of our labors. Your prompt cables of approval gave us encouragement and aroused a most hearty responsiveness by the United States. Please accept the profound expression of our gratitude for your congratulations, which we reciprocate to you all.

On January 8, 1909, Cromwell sent to J. A. Orango, secretary of foreign relations of Panama, at Panama, the following telegram:

I appreciate deeply your advice by cable of this date containing congratulations and approval. It is, indeed, a glorious result, for, aside from the material advantage for Panama, it places the nation in a firm and splendid position, not only with respect of this Government, but all the nations of the world. You should justly feel proud at your important part in this great achievement. I am sending you full report by mail steamer Panama to-morrow. I am leaving for Washington to-night to close treaty.

CROMWELL.

I think we can, therefore, safely assume that, whatever these treaties contain, Mr. Cromwell is responsible for them.

Now, permit me to ask some gentleman on the other side to explain why we should pay to the Republic of Colombia, with a deficit of $84,000,000 staring us in the face, $10,000,000 more than when I made my first speech on this subject, the enormous sum of $1,250,000? Can you think of any reason why Panama should also pay to Colombia $2,500,000 and impoverish herself in doing it?

Mr. LOVERING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I will, though I have but little time.

Mr. LOVERING. Why does the gentleman discuss the subject of this treaty on the floor of the House?

Mr. RAINEY. I will tell the gentleman, if he will keep still.

Mr. LOVERING. It is a matter between the State Department and Panama. The treaty is now before the United States Senate and should not be discussed in the House.

Mr. RAINEY. I am discussing a treaty between Panama and Colombia, published by William Nelson Cromwell in the Panama Star and Herald, and I have a right to discuss it. In view of Mr. Cromwell's proposed treaty between Colombia and Panama, I have no hesitancy in saying that there is something he and the present administration are laboring to cover up. Under the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty we commence, in 1913, to pay to Panama $250,000 per year forever as rental for the Canal Zone. Under the treaties which Mr. Cromwell proposes we are to commence to make now, and this year, these payments of $250,000 per year. In other words, he proposes that the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty shall be amended so as to provide that our payments of $250,000 per year as rental for the Canal Zone shall commence, not nine years from the date of the ratification of the treaty, but four years from the date of the ratification of the treaty. In other words, he proposes to so change the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty as to impose upon this country, already burdened with a tremendous Treasury deficit—with hundreds of millions of dollars of Panama Canal appropriations staring us in the face—the additional burden of $1,250,000.

And he proposes that this enormous sum shall be taken from our Treasury and paid, not to the Republic of Panama, but to Colombia. In addition to that, he proposes that for five years after 1913 the $250,000 per year we have agreed to pay to Panama shall be paid by us to Colombia direct. In other words, by the treaties of which he is so proud Panama deprives herself for five years of her fixed source of revenue and consents that it be paid to Colombia, and the United States contributes from its Treasury $1,250,000 and pays it to the treasury of Colombia. This is not all Mr. Cromwell proposes to do for the Republic of Panama.

On account of an extension of the canal franchise granted by Colombia to the New French Panama Canal Company Colombia became the owner of 50,000 shares of stock in the new company, with a par value of 5,000,000 francs. In order that I may not be charged by Mr. Cromwell's representatives with obtaining information from blackmailers, I read from the testimony of William Nelson Cromwell before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, page 1115, Senate Document No. 401, second session Fifty-ninth Congress:

Senator MORGAN. In one of the purchases or extensions or prolongations of concessions made by Colombia to the Panama Canal Company the sum of $1,000,000, or 5,000,000 francs, were issued in stocks to Colombia?

Mr. CROMWELL. Yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

Senator MORGAN. The shares have been paid?

Mr. CROMWELL. * * * The shares stand in the name of the Republic of Colombia and are now in litigation in France. * * *

Senator MORGAN. Then, according to your statement, if I understand it, Colombia is still an owner of how many shares?

Mr. CROMWELL. Five million francs. * * *

Senator MORGAN. Of shares in the New Panama Canal Company?

Mr. CROMWELL. Yes, sir; the total capital of which company is 65,000,000 francs. I do not admit by my reply, Senator, and I do not wish to admit, that Colombia is the real owner of those shares. I do not pass upon that question.

These shares are still held in France in order to permit some determination to be made as to their ownership. The shares never have been delivered to Colombia, and the supposed revolution which occurred there on November 3, 1903, had the effect of transferring the sovereignty of the canal strip to Panama. I submit that any international court would hold that Panama is now clearly entitled to nearly $1,250,000, deposited in France, a part of the $40,000,000 paid for the canal awaiting the determination as to who is the owner of these shares. Any impartial court would give this money to Panama or to the United States, depending upon which country exercises sovereignty over the canal strip at the present time. It certainly can not be held that Colombia exercises any sovereignty there. Under the franchise of the Panama Railroad Company that company agreed to pay a rental of $25,000 per year to Panama. In our treatment of the matter we regard the sovereignty over the strip as being so far transferred to the United States that the annual payments due from the railroad are now being made to the United States Government. I do not understand that the United States, however, is claiming the moneys deposited in France on account of these shares.

The treaty for which Mr. Cromwell claims so much credit provides that the Republic of Panama shall surrender to the Republic of Colombia all its claim to the moneys arising from the sale made by the New French Panama Canal Company to the United States on account of moneys due on the shares held there in escrow. In other words, for some reason it has become necessary for Mr. Cromwell—and when I speak of Mr. Cromwell I mean also the present administration here and the future administration, because in Panama matters he acts for both—to placate the Republic of Colombia. Mr. Cromwell seems to have arranged matters so that the United States will be called upon to assume an additional obligation of $1,250,000 and to pay it to Colombia. The Republic of Panama, by these treaties, consents for five years, commencing with 1913, that we pay to the Republic of Colombia $250,000 per year, $1,250,000 in all; and the Republic of Panama turns over moneys in France rightfully belonging to it to Colombia to the amount of $1,250,000. In other words, the United States and Panama are asked to make these sacrifices, and Colombia gets out of it $3,750,000 in cash. Mr. Cromwell's position is that this is being done in order that Panama may pay a part of the public debt of Colombia.

I submit that in the history of the world no such treaty as this has ever been seriously contemplated. Since the completion of our own successful revolution against England, over a century and a quarter ago, no man has been found in this country, or even in England, willing to advance the doctrine that we ought to pay part of the public debt of England, either foreign or domestic. I know of no precedent for Mr. Cromwell's treaties. No people in the world, so far as I know, after having successfully completed a revolution, have ever been called upon or have ever agreed to pay any portion of the debt, foreign or domestic, of the country from which they separated.

Now, in this connection, I want to refer to my resolution providing for an investigation as to the disposition of the $40,000,000 fund, which we of record appear to have paid to the French company. My investigation of the records show that at every meeting of the directors of the New Panama Canal Company in France Colombia was represented. Colombia ought to know, and evidently does know, what became of the $40,000,000. This is the only reference I have ever made on this floor to my resolution. And let me suggest in this connection that if Colombia does know what became of the $40,000,000 fund, no better method could be found in which to silence Colombia and destroy incriminating evidence than to pay to her the enormous sum of $3,750,000. I simply make the suggestion. It may be that this tremendous bribe to Colombia is being arranged in order to cover up facts with reference to the supposed revolution of November 3, 1903, on the Isthmus of Panama, and the connection of the present administration with the same. The conclusion is irresistible that Mr. Cromwell is arranging these treaties for one or the other of these reasons. All that Panama gets out of the treaties is the agreement on the part of Colombia to recognize her independence, and an agreement on the part of Colombia to determine boundary lines in an almost impenetrable jungle, where land is of no value and where few people live. Of what benefit to Panama is the recognition of her independence by Colombia? In the very first clause of the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty the United States forever guarantees the independence of the Republic of Panama.

Permit me now in this connection to call attention to another remarkable situation on the Isthmus of Panama. With thousands of capable young men seeking employment in this country, in this period of depression, with a panic on our hands from which we have not yet emerged, the President has issued an executive order permitting the employment of citizens of Panama in important positions on the Canal Zone. Heretofore the personnel of gold employees has been restricted to American citizens. We now agree to employ also citizens of Panama. In order that some acute reasoner on the other side may not charge me with obtaining my information from blackmailers, I insert here in my speech my recent correspondence with the Isthmian Canal Commission on this subject:

ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSION,
WASHINGTON OFFICE,
February 18, 1909.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 17th instant, and in compliance with your request there is inclosed herewith a copy of the executive order of December 23, 1908, amending the executive order of February 8, 1908, so as to allow the employment of Panamanian citizens on the gold roll of the Isthmian Canal Commission on the Isthmus.

Very respectfully,

F. C. BOGGS,
Captain, Corps of Engineers, U. S. Army,
Chief of Office.

Inclosure: Copy executive order of December 23, 1908 (873-100).

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

By authority of the President, it is Ordered, That the executive order of February 8, 1908, restricting the personnel of gold employees to American citizens be amended to read as follows:

"On and after this date the employment by the Isthmian Canal Commission of skilled laborers, clerks, and all others who have heretofore been known as 'gold employees' of the commission shall be restricted to American citizens and citizens of Panama, except where American or Panamanian labor or services of the character required is not available."

Foreign employees now upon the pay roll of the commission shall not be affected by this order, save in the event of any reduction of force preference shall be accorded to American citizens and citizens of Panama.

ROBERT SHAW OLIVER,
Acting Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., December 23, 1908.

Permit me to suggest that with Mr. Cromwell and Mr. Drake and the others controlling the situation on the Canal Zone, a judicious distribution of our Isthmian Canal patronage among the partisans of members of the General Assembly of Panama will result in most important concessions to Mr. Cromwell and his friends. I have never seen a citizen of Panama whose highest ambition in life was not to hold some official position, and about half the population do hold some official position. If they can not get anything else, they are satisfied to serve as policemen at a salary of a few dollars per month. There are more politicians and public officials to the acre in Panama than in any other section of the entire world. The distribution of our patronage among Panamanians may mean other things. I do not know how many Panamanians are now employed, nor what promises have been made to them, but I can notice the rather suspicious closing up of one or two of my sources of information on the Isthmus of Panama.

When the Canal Zone government bill was pending in the House a few days ago, I offered an amendment which provided that positions on the gold rolls in Panama should go only to American citizens, insisting that if by that bill we were proposing to inaugurate the most gigantic system of spoils ever heard of in the world, the spoils ought to go to American citizens, even if none of them were members of my party.

The amendment I proposed received not a single vote on the Republican side of this House, and every Democratic vote was cast for it.

The proposed Cromwell treaties provide that all differences that may arise between the United States and Panama as to the interpretation to be given the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty shall be submitted to arbitration, the United States to appoint one member of a tribunal of arbitration, the Republic of Panama to appoint another, the two members thus nominated to select a third member. If they fail to agree, the treaties provide that Peru shall select the third. It follows, as a matter of course, that the third member, if selected by Peru, and Panama would, of course, force this situation, would be friendly to Panama.

There is only one question of difference pending now between the United States and Panama on account of the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty, and that refers to the question of tariffs. Panama insists the commissaries we have established on the zone should be discontinued, under the treaty, and that the United States should permit the Republic of Panama to collect duties on the articles sent to the Isthmus and sold to the twenty-five or thirty thousand employees of the United States on the Canal Zone. This is the question that is likely to arise, after these treaties go into effect, if they are ever ratified, and under the circumstances we can expect this question to be decided, if Mr. Cromwell's plans prevail, against the United States. In other words, the situation Mr. Cromwell is endeavoring to force by the treaties is this:

The United States is to be required to increase its Treasury deficit and to pay to Colombia $1,250,000; Panama impoverishes herself by giving up the $1,250,000, clearly belonging to her, now held in France, and gives up for five years after 1913 the revenue we propose to pay her. In return for this Panamanians are to be admitted to the lucrative positions on the Canal Zone in our service, and ultimately, in order to permit Panama to recoup her losses on account of the Cromwell treaties, she is to be permitted to levy taxes upon the army of Americans and other employees we have sent to the Isthmus for the purpose of building this canal.

I respectfully submit that in these treaties Mr. Cromwell's hand is upraised, as it always has been, against the Treasury of his country, and he is doing the best he can to betray the country, with reference to which he occupies now a supreme advisory position.

Two of these treaties have been given out by Cromwell and Obaldia and published in the Panama Star and Herald on Monday, January 18. I have obtained the proposed Cromwell treaty between Panama and Colombia from that paper and will print it as an appendix to my speech. These treaties, it appears from the information given out by Mr. Cromwell, have already been approved by the present administration in this country. It remains yet to be seen whether they will be ratified by the General Assembly of Panama and by the Senate of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

APPENDIX.

The following item appeared in the Panama Star and Herald of January 18, 1909 (a paper published in the city of Panama, Republic of Panama):

DRAFT OF PANAMA-COLOMBIA TREATY.

Through the courtesy of His Excellency President Obaldia we are able to present a draft of the treaty between Panama and Colombia, which was signed at Washington at midnight of the 9th instant, as announced in our columns yesterday.

There may be in the text of the signed treaty certain modifications of some of the articles as they appear in the draft, but, pending the receipt of the approved text, we think the following of sufficient general interest and importance to warrant publication at the present time.

The following copy of the Panama-Colombia treaty, as given out by President Obaldia, of Panama, appeared in the same issue of the above newspaper. It contemplates the enactment of treaties between the United States and Panama and the United States and Colombia before it becomes effective:

Treaty between the Republic of Colombia and the Republic of Panama.

The Republic of Colombia and the Republic of Panama, equally animated by the desire to remove all obstacles to their good understanding, to adjust their pecuniary and other relations to each other, and to mutually secure the benefits of amity and accord, have determined to conclude a convention for these purposes, and therefore have appointed as their respective plenipotentiaries; that is to say, the President of the Republic of Colombia, Enrique Cortes, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Republic of Colombia, and the President of the Republic of Panama, Carlos Constantino Arosemena, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Republic of Panama, who after having communicated to each other their respective full powers found in good and due form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

RECOGNITION OF INDEPENDENCE.

The Republic of Colombia recognizes the independence of the Republic of Panama and acknowledges it to be a free, sovereign, and independent nation as of the 3d day of November, 1903.

ARTICLE II.

DECLARATIONS OF AMITY.

There shall be a mutual and inviolable peace and friendship between the Government of Colombia and its citizens on the one part and the Government of the Republic of Panama and its citizens on the other part, without exception of persons or places under their respective dominion.

ARTICLE III.

PECUNIARY RELATIONS—TRANSFER OF CERTAIN INSTALLMENTS—INDEMNIFICATION OF PANAMA AGAINST EXTERNAL AND INTERNAL INDEBTEDNESS.

The Republic of Panama assigns and transfers to the Republic of Colombia and its assigns and nominees, in lawful and due form, the first ten annual installments of $250,000 gold coin, each becoming due to it, the Republic of Panama, from the United States of America on the 26th days of February in the years 1908 to 1917, both inclusive, under and pursuant to the provisions of article 14 of the treaty between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama exchanged February 26, 1904, and under and pursuant to the amendment thereof embodied in a treaty of even date between said nations, whereby said article 14 is amended by substituting the words "four years" for the words "nine years," so that the first annual payment of which that article treats shall begin four years from the exchange of said treaty of February 26, 1904, instead of nine years from said date, in such manner that the said installments shall be paid by the United States of America directly to the Republic of Colombia or its assigns and nominees for account of the Republic of Panama, in lawful and due form, beginning the 26th day of February, 1908. Such installments as may have matured when the ratifications of this treaty shall be exchanged pursuant to its terms shall be payable on the thirtieth day after the date of such exchange.

In consideration of the payments and releases which the Republic of Panama makes to the Republic of Colombia the latter recognizes and agrees that the Republic of Panama has no liability upon and no obligations to the holders of the external and internal debt of Colombia nor to the Republic of Colombia by reason of any such indebtedness of claims. Colombia recognizes and agrees that it is itself solely obligated for such external and internal debt, assumes the obligation to pay and discharge the same by itself alone, and agrees to indemnify and hold harmless the Republic of Panama, should occasion arise, from any liability and expense in respect of such external and internal indebtedness.

ARTICLE IV.

MUTUAL EXONERATION.

Each of the contracting Republics releases and discharges the other from all pecuniary claims and obligations of any nature whatever, including the external and internal debt of Colombia, which either had against the other on the 3d day of November, 1903, it being understood that this reciprocal exoneration relates only to the national debts and claims of one against the other, and that it does not relate to individual rights and claims of the citizens of either Republic. It is understood that such individual rights and claims which originated in incidents occurring previous to the 3d day of November, 1903, shall be decided in accordance with the legislation of the Republic against which they are presented and by the tribunals or authorities of the same, so that in no case shall the claimant enjoy greater privileges or advantages than the citizens of the Republic against which the demand is made.

ARTICLE V.

CONFIRMATION BY PANAMA OF ITS ABANDONMENT OF ANY CLAIM TO PANAMA CANAL SHARES.

The Republic of Panama recognizes that it has no title or ownership of any sort to the 50,000 shares of the capital stock of the New Panama Canal Company standing in the name of the Republic of Colombia on the books of said company at Paris, and the Republic of Panama confirms the abandonment of all right and title which, with respect to said shares, it made in the courts of justice of France.

ARTICLE VI.

RIGHTS OF CITIZENS.

The citizens of each Republic residing in the territory of the other shall enjoy the same civil rights which from time to time are accorded by the laws of the country of residence to the citizens of the most favored nation. It being understood, however, that the citizens of either of the two Republics residing in the other shall be exempt from military services imposed upon the citizens of such Republic.

The natives of the country of either of the two contracting Republics who have heretofore or shall hereafter become citizens by naturalization in the other Republic, shall not be punished, molested, or discriminated against by the Government of the country of which they were natives, or by the citizens thereof, by reason of their acts of adhesion to the country whose citizenship they have adopted.

ARTICLE VII.

NEITHER NATION SHALL ANNEX TERRITORY OF THE OTHER.

Both Republics agree, each for itself, that neither of them shall admit to form any part of its nationality any part of the territory of the other which separates from it by force.,

ARTICLE VIII.

NEGOTIATIONS TO BE CONDUCTED FOR TREATY OF COMMERCE, ETC.

As soon as this treaty and the contemporaneous treaty of even date between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama and between the United States of America and the Republic of Colombia shall be ratified and exchanged, negotiations shall be entered upon between the Republics of Panama and Colombia for the conclusion of additional treaty or treaties, covering questions of commerce, postal, telegraph, copyright, consular relations, extradition of criminals, and the like.

ARTICLE IX.

It is agreed between the high contracting parties, and is declared, that the dividing line between the Republic of Colombia and the Republic of Panama shall be as follows, to wit:

From Cape Tiburon, on the Atlantic, to the headwaters of the Rio de la Miel, and following the range by the Cerro de Gandi to the Sierra de Chugargun and that of Mali, going down by the Cerros of Nique to the heights of Espave, and from there to the Pacific at such point and by such line as shall be determined by the tribunal of arbitration hereinafter provided, and the determination of said line shall conform to the decision of the tribunal of arbitration in respect of the title and limits of the district or corregimiento of Jurado, as next provided.

As to the district or corregimiento of Jurado, the boundaries and attribution of which to either the Republic of Colombia or the Republic of Panama will be fixed by the determination of the line aforesaid by said tribunal of arbitration, the title thereto and the precise limits thereof and the right to the sovereignty thereof as between the high contracting parties shall be conclusively determined by arbitration in the following manner:

SECTION 1. A tribunal of arbitration shall be created to investigate and determine all questions of fact and law concerning the rights of the high contracting parties to all the territory in the above-mentioned region of Jurado. The tribunal shall consist of three members; the Republic of Colombia shall nominate one member, the Republic of Panama shall nominate one member, both of whom shall be nominated within three months after the exchange of ratifications of this treaty, and the two members of the tribunal thus nominated shall jointly nominate a third member, or, in the event of their failure to agree within three months next after the appointment of the last of them, and on request of the President of either of the high contracting parties, the third member of the tribunal shall be appointed by the President of the Republic of Peru.

The tribunal shall hold its sessions at such place as the tribunal shall determine.

The case on behalf of each party, with the papers and documents, shall be communicated to the other party within three months after the appointment of the third member of the tribunal.

The counter cases shall be similarly communicated, with the papers and documents, within three months after communication of the cases, respectively.

And within two months after communication of the counter case the other party may communicate its reply.

The proceedings of the tribunal shall be governed by the provisions, so far as applicable, of the convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes signed at The Hague by the representatives of both the parties hereto on the 18th day of October, 1907.

The tribunal shall take into consideration all relevant laws and treaties and all facts proved of occupancy, possession, and political or administrative control in respect of the territory in dispute.

ARTICLE X.

THIS TREATY CONDITIONAL UPON EXCHANGE OF TREATIES OF EVEN DATE BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND COLOMBIA AND UNITED STATES AND PANAMA.

This treaty shall not be binding upon either of the high contracting parties nor have any force until and unless the treaty signed on the same date between the Republic of Panama and the United States of America and between the Republic of Colombia and the United States of America are both duly ratified and ratification thereof exchanged simultaneously with the exchange of the ratification of this treaty.

ARTICLE XI.

RATIFICATION AND EXCHANGE.

The present treaty shall be submitted for ratification to the respective Governments and ratifications hereof exchanged at Washington as soon as possible.

The following is a telegram from Cromwell and the minister of Panama to the United States admitting responsibility for the above treaty. It appeared in the same paper.

DESIRED AGREEMENT REACHED AT LAST—TREATY WITH COLOMBIA SIGNED—LONG-STANDING DIFFERENCE SETTLED.

On Sunday the following important cablegram from Washington was received at executive headquarters:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 10, 1909.

OBALDIA, Arango, Panama.

All three treaties signed at midnight and we rejoice at this happy conclusion of our labors. Your prompt cables of approval gave us encouragement and aroused a most hearty responsiveness by the United States. Please accept the profound expression of our gratitude for your congratulations which we reciprocate to you all.

AROSEMENA.
CROMWELL.

The news was quickly circulated throughout the city by means of fly sheets and was the subject of comment during the afternoon. Many expressions of satisfaction were heard in influential circles at this happy conclusion of a long-pending matter.

Another telegram from Cromwell appearing in the Panama papers having reference to the Panama treaties:

MESSAGE FROM MR. CROMWELL.

The following congratulatory cablegram has been received by the Hon. J. A. Arango, secretary of foreign relations, from Mr. William N. Cromwell, Panama's counsel in the United States:

NEW YORK, January 8, 1909.

SECRETARY ARANGO, Panama:

I appreciate deeply your advice by cable of this date containing congratulations and approval.

It is indeed a glorious result, for aside from the material advantage for Panama, it places the nation in a firm and splendid position, not only with respect of this Government but all the nations of the world. You should justly feel proud at your important part in this great achievement. I am sending you full report by mail steamer Panama to-morrow. Am leaving for Washington to-night to close treaty.

CROMWELL.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GILLETT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 27139. An act to provide for the sittings of the United States circuit and district courts of the northern district of Ohio at the city of Youngstown, in said district; and

H. R. 26068. An act providing for an additional judge for the western district of Pennsylvania, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 9286. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish two condemned brass or bronze field guns, carriages, and cannon balls to the State of Colorado; and

S. 9198. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish two condemned brass or bronze field guns, carriages, and cannon balls to the State of Utah.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution 68.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, be, and hereby are, authorized to cancel their signatures to the enrolled bill H. R. 25155 an act to amend an act approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," and that the said bill be reenrolled with the intention of the words "third paragraph of the" after the words "That the" in the first line after the enacting words of the said bill.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 26916) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CLAPP, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. OWEN as the said conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 26915) making appropriation for the support of the army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. FORAKER, and Mr. TALIAFERRO as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 21896) to amend section 86 of an act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, to provide for additional judges, and for other judicial purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. OVERMAN as the said conferees on the part of the Senate.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING].

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Chairman, I apprehend that the House is very much wearied with this matter and would fain return to business, but I feel compelled to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], who has just taken his seat.

He has revealed to us this morning very little that is new or very little that he had not previously stated on the floor of the House. He has proven nothing. I expected the gentleman would give us the names of his informants. He has finished his speech without enlightening us upon that point. The chief burden of his speech seems to be an attack upon William Nelson Cromwell. Now, I do not propose to say any more in behalf of Mr. Cromwell than I have already said, but I do propose to say to the gentleman that when he was willing to admit that Mr. C. P. Taft had cleared himself of any connection with any Panama deals by his own disclaimer, that Mr. Cromwell was equally entitled to have his disclaimer respected. Now, I have in my hand a paper from Panama published on the 11th day of February, the day before I made my speech in reply to the gentleman from Illinois; and, by the way, this paper is the organ of the opposition to the Obaldia government. This paper contains an editorial, which I have had translated. It states that none of these gentlemen had any connection whatever with the railroad and timber contracts. They did not even know that there were any timber contracts or any railroad contracts. Now, for one moment to refer to the railroad contracts. A railroad contract was proposed by Mr. Randall Ward. It was rejected by the Panama Congress in toto three months ago, and in its place the Panama Congress enacted a law on the 5th of January, twenty-one days before Mr. RAINEY made his speech, stating that the railroad contract was then before that congress, which provides that the railroad shall be built by the Government. The Panama Congress, on January 5, passed an act authorizing the Government to build the road, and that is the law to-day, and there is no way to go back on that action, and so all dispute had ended long before the gentleman had made his speech.

In regard to Mr. Cromwell, or any of these gentlemen named, having any part in either the railroad or timber contracts, not one of them had a single thing to do with them and they were not known in them; and, moreover, some of these gentlemen are not known to each other. Mr. Cromwell and Mr. Douglas Robinson never saw each other, and never spoke to each other, never corresponded, nor was there ever a word passed between Obaldia and any of these gentlemen in regard to the subject of these contracts.

As to the timber contract. This timber contract was a matter that involved neither the payment of money nor the concession of any land by the Government of Panama whatsoever. It was purely and simply in the interest of the State of Panama as a source of revenue. They sold part of the stumpage for cash, and that was all there was to it. In reference to these contracts, I say again that Mr. Cromwell, nor any of these gentlemen in New York, had anything at all to do with them.

Now, the gentleman seems to shift his charge from one ground to another to suit his purpose, and fails absolutely to show from whom he got his information. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from La Estrella de Panama, with the consent of the House. It is a disclaimer as regards all these gentlemen having anything whatsoever to do with this transaction.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as part of his remarks the matter he has referred to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Before consent is given, I would like to ask what is contained in the editorial? A good many matters have crept into the RECORD of late which are clean-cut breaches of the privilege of the House.

Mr. LOVERING. It is a translation of La Estrella de Panama, refuting some of the slanderous charges.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then I object.

Mr. LOVERING. It is a refutation of some of the charges.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I object, Mr. Chairman, because I do not think outsiders have the right to enter into debate with Members upon the floor of this House.

Mr. LOVERING. Very well, Mr. Chairman; then let me ask, what right we, as outsiders, have to enter into the affairs of Panama and to discuss what happened in that legislature? [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman's resolution were passed, the investigation would be as to outsiders.

Mr. LOVERING. The gentleman has already offered a resolution, and he is not pushing it. I would only be too glad to have it passed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why does not the committee report it?

Mr. LOVERING. I do not know; the gentleman must ask me some other conundrum.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why not report it, so that we can have everything made plain?

Mr. LOVERING. The gentleman does not push anything that will do anything or prove anything. I will take occasion at some other time to reply more fully to the gentleman's speech, if necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I regard the speeches made by the gentleman from Illinois last month and this month as most unfortunate, not only for himself but as regards the relations between this House and the country. In a somewhat extended service here I have never known of such a nonchalant disregard for accuracy and for the reputation of men at home and abroad. [Loud applause.] I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, it is beneath the dignity of this House, and certainly I say the gentleman's own dignity, to refer flippantly to a man by saying he ought to be a freak in a museum. That man has his home and family, and a Member should be forced to stand up and sustain some accusation against him rather than speak of him as a freak in a museum. [Loud applause.]

Mr. RAINEY rose.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I decline to yield; perhaps I will later.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman has admitted it on this floor.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I have heard of no admission.

Mr. RAINEY. His letter has been read admitting it.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. The distinctive feature of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois to-day has been that he abandons for the most part his accusations made in former speeches, and goes afield and brings in a new lot of accusations here, relating for the most part to a treaty now pending between Panama and the United States, but involving Colombia as well. It would have been more edifying for the House, it would have been more instructive for the country, if the gentleman had proven the accusations made a few days ago; and it is of little use for us to take up and seek to analyze a treaty that is now pending before the Senate. It is impossible that there should be such childlike, such careless, abandonment of the rights of this country as to lead to the unfavorable results which the gentleman has portrayed before us. While most of us in this House have not studied this treaty, because it does not belong to our branch, it is evident that the gentleman from Illinois does not understand it any better than the rest of us, or he would not have sought to take our time in useless discussion.

I must disapprove of his methods. At great length he declaimed here a few days ago about a timber contract pending down in Panama. He declaimed about a concession for a railroad. It appears that the timber contract has been entirely abandoned. It appears that so far from granting a concession to any private individuals to build a railroad, the Government of Panama by its congress voted on the 5th of January, some considerable time before the gentleman's speech was made, that the railroad should be built by the Government and not by private individuals. That is an old scandal. It was old when the gentleman gave credence to it and uttered it here on the 26th of January. It was even then a foreclosed incident. Let our information be up to date.

With great earnestness the gentleman declaimed that we should right wrongs. No one will contradict him on that; but I do object to conjuring up wrongs when there are real wrongs to right.

I object to going into another country and seeking to control its policy, when we have wrongs enough at home to take care of. [Applause on the Republican side.]

These are the questions this House should consider: Is the enterprise on the Isthmus being prosecuted with vigor and, as far as possible, with economy? We certainly should insist that it be managed with honesty. This canal is going to cost a great deal more than was anticipated it would cost. Some of us foretold that in 1902. In the first place, the plans have been changed. It has been made a somewhat larger enterprise than was contemplated. The necessity for sanitation has developed, and sanitation has been provided at very great expense. There has been an increase in the cost of labor and of material, but we are committed to the building of that waterway, and, whatever its expense may be, this country should prosecute it to a prompt and successful termination. [Applause.] There can be no disagreement about that. We have commenced it, and let us go through with it.

But at the same time we must do full justice to the men who are engaged in this work. We should uphold their hands. We should protect them against false accusations from whatever source they may happen to come. In connection with this whole matter there has been an unusual amount of muck raking. It is in part a survival from the old disappointment because another route was not selected. Men who have attacked those engaged in the building of the canal and who have attacked the officials of the Government having to do with it have not been satisfied with scraping through all the sewers in New York and in this country, but they have found it necessary to go down into the miasmatic swamps and polluted pools of Panama, and covered with the slime which they have accumulated, they have sought to communicate a part of it to others who have been doing their best and who have been faithful to the great enterprise and the public. [Applause.]

It is on behalf of these latter that I want to speak to-day. The statement was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] a few days ago that the cut at Culebra was no deeper than when the French left it. In that he was in error. It is true that there had been a narrow prism constructed which had gone to a considerable depth during the time in which the French were engaged in the work. The first thing to do was to widen it. I have a report received from the Isthmian Canal Commission within a few days, in which it stated the following:

ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSION,
PURCHASING DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 13, 1909.

Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I inclose herewith a sketch taken from the Canal Record showing the condition up to June 1, 1908. This typical section indicates that although the French excavation had gone to a rather low level, yet the width of the excavation as compared to the width as finally excavated by the Americans was very small. It also indicates that an additional cut had been made by the Americans at that time below the lowest level reached by the French. This is further illustrated in the inclosed map, plate No. 26, taken from the report of the commission for 1908. On this plate is shown a longitudinal section through the Culebra cut indicating the original surface, the lowest line when Americans commenced work, and the line of excavation on June 30, 1908. It might be added in this connection that this section does not indicate the full amount of work done by the Americans, as the entire excavation made by the French was not only lowered, but was considerably widened, as indicated on the cross section taken from the Canal Record. The actual figures covering the amount of material taken out by the French and the Americans are as follows:

Total amount excavated by the old and new French companies to May 1, 1904 ---------- cubic yards --	22,600,000
Total amount of material taken out by the Americans since their occupation up to January 31, 1909 --- cubic yards --	27,615,000

Reverting to the section from the Canal Record, which, as is indicated, is merely a typical cross section, it might be stated that the original surface of the ground for the typical cross section was 190 feet above the sea level. The French excavated to a level of about 145 feet above sea level to width of about 110 feet. The Americans have increased the width of this excavation down to the 145-foot level to width of about 400 feet, and have, in addition, excavated a cut approximately 50 feet wide down to the elevation of about 130 feet above sea level. This, it is noted, was the status on June 1, 1908, since which time an additional amount of 9,170,000 cubic yards have been taken from the cut.

I regret that I have no typical section showing the condition of affairs at the present time, but it can be stated positively that every square foot of the canal prism through the Culebra cut has been lowered materially below the level as left by the French, and, in addition, the prism left by the French has been widened three or four times.

Attention is invited to the fact that when speaking of the Culebra cut reference is had to a stretch of the canal about 9½ miles long.

Very respectfully,

F. C. BOGGS,
Captain, Corps of Engineers, U. S. Army,
General Purchasing Officer.

So this enterprise is being prosecuted in a proper manner in a businesslike way, and the gentleman's statement in regard to its not having been lowered was entirely incorrect. It has been lowered over the whole width of the cut.

I note that the President-elect is criticised. It is said by the gentleman from Illinois that the only object Mr. Taft had in going to Panama last year was to press the candidacy of a candidate for the presidency; that he made veiled threats that if one of the candidates was not elected direful results—I have forgotten exactly what they were—would follow to Panama; that he used force to bring about the election of a candidate. From beginning to end those statements are absolutely incorrect. The President-elect of the United States, then Secretary of War, went to Panama to encourage and promote the work in the first place. He took his time to go there to give his sanction and his encouragement to those who were engaged in it, to settle a number of perplexing questions that had arisen with reference to the occupancy of the Canal Zone.

When there he found that fraudulent registration had been resorted to. He was called upon by one side to see that there was a fair election, and he believed in a fair election. He communicated with the leaders of the respective parties, and before soldiers or marines were detailed to go to the polls the request was made not only by the one party, but by the other. There was not an iota of violence. What he did was virtually in fulfillment of obligations binding upon us to preserve order on the Isthmus. I submit the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] should retract his statement made against the President-elect, of whom I believe that we can say, whether we agree with him in politics or not, that we all respect him and believe him to be an able executive, devoted to the good of his country. [Applause on the Republican side.] Yet he has been put in this speech on a level with the scurvy politician who is resorting to force and to violence! Is this a proper accusation to be made in this House and allowed to go without rebuke?

I shall enter upon no extended defense of the others named here. Mr. Cromwell seems to be the special object of attack of the gentleman from Illinois. Mr. Cromwell is one of the most active, intense, and able lawyers in this country. He labored hard, as was his duty, for the selection of the Panama route by the United States, and it is to his efforts more than anything else that this country, as I believe, was saved from a great blunder in the selection of a route. His course in that regard was not perhaps altogether actuated by motives of patriotism. It was in the course of his employment as a lawyer. Since then he has been the attorney for the Republic of Panama. No one is so familiar with the conditions on the Isthmus as he is. Without compensation, with the full knowledge of the State and War departments that he has represented this other interest, he has assisted the President and the Secretary of State and the Secretary of War whenever any tangle has arisen down there. I submit that having performed this service without pay, with the full and complete understanding of what he represents, he is entitled to just treatment in this House and to a proper tribute of respect for the great results which he has achieved.

Mr. Farnham is the secretary of Mr. Cromwell. Oh, it is always very easy to jump on a subordinate. I know no reason why we should take up the time of this House in attacking or defending anyone in matters which do not concern us. His salary has been mentioned. To my mind, there are far weightier matters that we can consider in this House of Representatives than the course of a subordinate in his dealings with Panama. The people of that country have shown themselves extremely able to take care of themselves. If there was fraud or a threat of graft in the timber contract, they turned it down. If there was danger in a privately constructed railroad, they decided their railroads should be built by the Government; and I say here that, great as we may be in this body, which represents the greatest government in the world, it is hardly in accordance with comity or courtesy for us to drag in here the transactions of another Republic, however humble or however small or however remote it may be. We should be too big for such trifling. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I am not going to enter into a discussion of the factions down there. You all know in Latin America they have factions, and they are sometimes very bitter. I must say this, in extenuation of the course of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], that I think he has taken one side, a disappointed side, for his information. He has taken their material and their falsehoods without analyzing them. But I am inclined to think that I am not taking the side of any faction when I say that their President is the man best fitted for the office. It was said of him by the gentleman from Illinois that down in Colombia he was the only one who was ready to betray his country. Betray his country! How serious an accusation is that. Should any man here or in Panama make the accusation of betrayal or treason without knowing the facts? What did Obaldia do? Down in the Congress of Colombia, when a treaty with the United States was proposed which would have given us the right to construct the canal, he stood up boldly and represented his constituency and told the Congress that trouble would ensue if it did not ratify that treaty.

He said that Panama was restive, that her people demanded that the Colombian Government, the capital of which was so remote from them, should pay some attention to their wishes. If that is betrayal, make the most of it. It was doing his duty to his constituency which sent him there. A reference was made again to an imprisonment of Obaldia—a further effort to belittle him. What was his imprisonment? He showed such loyalty to Colombia that he was appointed governor of Panama. It was thought that he could harmonize conditions——

Mr. RAINEY rose.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. At some later time I will perhaps yield; not now—that he could harmonize the conditions there. He went to Panama as governor. A rebellion occurred. The Government or control of Colombia was overthrown. Being the accredited governor from Colombia, he was regarded as one under suspicion. His house was guarded and he was placed in a sort of honorable confinement.

Why attack him as if he were a criminal, why attack him as if he were a traitor? He was elected by a full and fair vote of his countrymen to be President of Panama, and I do not care if they have a population less than even one of the least of our own States, it is not for us to insult their chief magistrate or make accusation against him which can not stand the light of day. [Applause.] Mr. C. P. Taft was attacked. Whenever there is any muck raking to be done about the Panama Canal his name is brought in. Now, it is true I have been through a political contest in which Mr. Taft was on the other side, but that contest was one which left with me nothing but the highest degree of respect for his honesty of purpose and his patriotism. In the fierce light that beat upon him when he was a candidate for the Senate I never heard a word that reflected upon his honesty as a man. [Applause.] I never heard a word that he was engaged in any scheme for exploitation in France or in Panama, and I do not believe a word of it now. [Applause.]

Why, are we not descending far below the level on which we should stand if we drag in the names of private citizens here and openly accuse them on the floor of the House with that which brings reproach and contumely?

Will the gentleman from Illinois, when he is outside of the protection afforded by the Constitution of the United States and the rules of this House, will he out in the open make the statements that he has been making here on the floor of this House? Will the gentleman make so free with reputations as he has in addressing us? Oh, this noise about there being a gathering of the members of the legislature where the names of Cromwell and others were mentioned as interested in the exploitation of a timber contract, everyone at that gathering has signed a statement throwing that yarn into the air, saying that not the name of a single one of them was mentioned during the meeting, and no one there knew that any one of them ever had any connection with it.

In the last campaign an effort was made to muddy the waters and make out that there was some graft in the disposition of the $40,000,000 paid to the French Panama Canal Company; and, to the credit of the Democratic national committee, be it said, they refused to have anything to do with such a scandal. And yet these accusations survive, and under those who, like the gentleman from Illinois, are too credulous, they have been brought in here to the House of Representatives to be again spread before the country. If there are any who should maintain a high standard of accuracy in statement, it is ourselves. We are subjects of attack. Every public man recognizes that he must be callous when his good name is maligned. The Members of this House are regarded as yielding to weakness when they contradict a statement, no matter how baldly erroneous it is. It is the experience of each Member that he must go on his way trusting to his general reputation and to the fairness of the people at large, brushing aside scandals when they circulate.

Now, can we afford to make here careless or reckless statements about persons outside? The world over, those who are most censorious are those who themselves are sure to receive censure in return, whether if it be just or unjust. If there is one thing for which every man in this House should labor, it should be to weigh his words, prizing the immortal possession of reputation. In the farewell address, which was read here to-day, George Washington ranks together three things—the protection of life, of reputation, and of property—and, as I recall that immortal document, reputation comes before property. Property once stolen may be recovered again. Time may supply the gaps made by losses, but what consolation is there for that man who prizes his good name, yet against whom wanton accusation is made and scattered broadcast over the land. We ought to be careful what goes into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

It ought to be a model newspaper. So far as I am personally concerned, I am perfectly willing to support a resolution for an investigation of this whole matter, but I am decidedly opposed to yielding to muck raking and sending committees hither and yon at great expense, thereby showing recognition of that which everybody knows is not true and does not need investigation. Have an investigation if you will, but I tell you that the precedent you will form will be that when anyone actuated by fondness for sensation, or desiring through envy or from any other cause to attack a man who is in the lime light, makes careless accusations, this Congress must lower its dignity and investigate the absurd yarns or perhaps the malicious falsehoods which are told. I am not in favor of ordering an investigation by the United States simply because a sensational newspaper attacks somebody. If you do that, you might as well disband all your committees and the Committee of the Whole and form yourselves into committees of investigation.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] seems to be honored because he is placed in the "Ananias Club." The "Ananias Club" has never taken out articles of incorporation. [Laughter.] It does not hold annual banquets. The members wear no button. Its members do not buy busts of the founder to place them in public halls. The census of the membership would be exceedingly difficult, but I am afraid the number of eligibles would be extremely large. [Laughter.] As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] has spoken as if it were an honor to be named as a member, some unkind persons outside will say that he is a paragon among eligibles for the first presidency of the "Ananias Club." [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, if that is out of order I will withdraw it. [Laughter.] But I say this with the reservation that the "Ananias Club" is not supposed to be altogether made up of persons who have intentionally made false statements, and I desire to relieve the gentleman from Illinois from any such imputation.

I think, however, that with a carelessness which ill befits a Member of this House, he has listened to statements of detraction against men whose reputations were above reproach; that he has listened to criticisms of public officials where no criticism but rather praise was due; that he has found fault with the prosecution of an enterprise which is being prosecuted with all vigor and dispatch, and which should have the support of every one of us. There are a number of other things he has said, which, if I were to take them up in detail, might be answered. I think I have dwelt upon those most important, and that I have pointed out his carelessness of statement in all these speeches. I especially deprecate the method which the gentleman from Illinois has pursued in coming in here and making accusations, and then, when his arguments and statements are contradicted, glancing away and bringing up new ones.

In the storehouse from which he draws there must be yarns new and old. Let us first have a square and direct statement from him and proof of that which he has already said, and if they are proven, the House will halt, and perhaps the country will halt, to listen to what else he has to say about the Panama Canal. But so long as the substantial averments which he has made have been proven groundless, it is not for us to turn aside from our ordinary business to pay attention to them or to seek investigation. Indeed, I do not know, Mr. Chairman, but I have already wasted half an hour answering something that needed no answer, because made up of statements which, if they do not fall to the ground from the weight of their improbability, have in them such absurdity and incorrectness that the House ought not to be detained to listen to a contradiction. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, quite apart from the probability or improbability of the charges made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], I think it must be clear that if this matter be dropped now, as is suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], a perfectly intolerable position will ensue. Charges of a grave character have been made upon the floor of this House against citizens of the United States. I do not propose to speak about the propriety of discussing relations between this great Republic and the small Republic of Panama, although I may say that I do not quite share the opinion which the gentleman from Ohio expresses of the enormity that characterizes such performances in this House. The Republic of Panama is not exactly an independent body, at least it can hardly be said to exist entirely independent of this country. It is a bantling of our own, and I am afraid it will return several times in the future to plague the serenity of this Government and of this House.

Without pausing to discuss that aspect of the question, I insist it would be an intolerable situation if citizens of the United States who have not been convicted of any crime can be assailed upon the floor of this House and no method provided by which the truth or accuracy of such accusations can be determined. This Government is established to protect the rights of citizens—all of them—and, as the gentleman from Ohio well says, the right to character stands next after the right to life. For my part, I think the right to character should be placed first, for a man whose character is gone, if he continues to live, must live like a dog.

Now, when accusations are made here they are spread upon the record. Surely common justice demands that some method should be devised by which that record can be made to declare whether the charges are justified or not. Some way or other persons so assailed should have the right to be heard in their defense, either here on the floor or by some agency appointed to take their exculpatory statements and empowered to spread them on the record.

When letters from persons who had been assailed were attempted to be read some days ago, objection was made that it was out of order for a Member to stand upon the floor and read a letter of explanation from a person who had been denounced, and the only way by which that letter could be read was by unanimous consent. Can it be possible that this Government, erected to establish justice and to maintain all the rights of every man subject to its jurisdiction, may have one of its branches—and that the most important—perverted and abused to level charges against citizens, to place these accusations in a permanent record, and then by a system of procedure exclude those citizens from the right even to be heard?

Mr. Chairman, this concerns the dignity, the value, aye, the very existence, of this House. This Government, which was designed to be the shield, the rampart of individual rights, and the citadel of justice—which has commanded the admiration of the world ever since it went into operation—will forfeit its title to either admiration or respect if this House, one of its most important features, be made a place from which accusations can be leveled against citizens and those accusations can not even be contradicted by the written declaration of the persons assailed. If such a condition be tolerated, then this body, which was established as an agency to protect right and establish justice, becomes an engine to perpetrate injustice that is intolerable.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have risen merely to suggest that in view of this debate the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING] is one which we are absolutely compelled to adopt if we would maintain the credit of the House itself. These charges, in view of the publicity that has been given to them, must be investigated. [Applause.] They should be investigated and the accuracy or inaccuracy of them once for all established, so that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD may stand an unimpeachable record of actual facts if the charges be true, or else by some formal action they may be declared untrue, so that there shall be spread upon the same record that has damaged an innocent citizen a solemn statement of the reparation made by the House itself. [Loud applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS.]

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the bill H. R. 24148, that I have introduced to provide for the establishment of a children's bureau of investigation and publicity under the Secretary of the Interior, and to add such arguments as I can to the forceful report already submitted by the committee. The bill calls for an expenditure of $51,820; that is, less than $52,000. I venture to say that no appropriation of $52,000 could be more blessed in its effects, be the means of bringing greater happiness to many, or accomplish more for the public welfare. The objects are described in the bill as follows:

> The said bureau shall investigate and report upon all matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life, and shall especially investigate the questions of infant mortality, the birth rate, physical degeneracy, orphanage, juvenile delinquency and juvenile courts, desertion and illegitimacy, dangerous occupations, accidents and diseases of children of the working classes, employment, legislation affecting children in the several States and Territories, and such other facts as have a bearing upon the health, efficiency, character, and training of children. The chief of said bureau shall, from time to time, publish the results of these investigations.

In other words, the bill seeks to establish in the Department of the Interior a central bureau to which all the States, all municipalities, all legislators, and all people generally who are interested in charitable and correctional work and the public welfare can go for information on all the various subjects mentioned in the bill.

No legislation on any matter affecting children is enacted by this bill. It infringes on no rights of the States. Nor is it contemplated that any statistical work, such as is done by the census, shall be done by this bureau. It is not with the statistics, but with the questions of infant mortality, birth rate, and so forth, that the bill deals. If there is any statistical work for the National Government to do that these questions might suggest a need for and that the Census Bureau does not now do, it will be far more economical and scientific that the work should be devolved upon that bureau than upon this new one. But this bureau would stimulate States, municipalities, and institutions to uniform methods of statistics, as has the Bureau of Education, and those statistics of States, municipalities, and institutions would enormously aid to an understanding of conditions and serve to measure the progress made in the lines covered by them.

WHAT THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT CAN DO.

What the Federal Government can do in the way of direct legislation affecting children may be little, but it can do a great deal in regard to information, investigation, and publicity, and it alone can do it, as alone could the Federal Bureaus of Labor and of Education accomplish some of the things they have accomplished, and to which I will allude later. Any body of citizens working on these problems will come to these conclusions, as did the New York committee on physical welfare of school children in regard to the Federal Bureau of Education, and as did the President's conference on dependent children in regard to this bureau.

NUMBER OF CHILDREN.

Of the total population of the United States at the last census, which was 75,994,575, 44.3 per cent, or 33,681,074, were under 20 years of age; 1,916,892 were under 1 year of age; 7,253,736 were from 1 to 4 years of age; 8,874,123 were from 5 to 9 years; 8,080,234 were from 10 to 14 years; and 7,556,089 were from 15 to 19 years.

The problems here discussed are national, but they concern particularly those who live in cities. There were 14,208,347 people (that is, 18.7 per cent) living in cities of over 100,000 inhabitants, of which there were in the North Atlantic division

7,533,280, or 35.8 per cent of its population, and in the North Central division 4,714,117, or 17.9 per cent of its population. There were, in addition, living in cities of over 25,000, 5,509,965 (7.3 per cent), of which 2,565,416 were in the North Atlantic division (12.2 per cent), and 1,383,767 in the North Central division (5.2 per cent). In the Western division 14.2 per cent were living in cities of over 100,000 inhabitants and 11.1 per cent in cities of over 25,000 inhabitants. The drift of population to the cities having over 25,000 inhabitants is irresistible. In 1880 they contained 9,953,396; in 1890, 14,880,255; and in 1900, 19,718,312, an increase of 49.5 per cent for the earlier decade, and of 32.5 per cent for the later decade. On the other hand, the increase in the whole population from 1880 to 1890 was only 24.9 per cent, and from 1890 to 1900, 20.7 per cent.

In cities of over 25,000 inhabitants those under 5 years of age were 2,054,790; those from 5 to 9, 1,989,341; and those from 10 to 14, 1,772,883; a total of children under 15 years in such cities of 5,817,014. The total families were 4,217,644; the average number of persons to a family, 4.7; and of the families only 25.7 per cent owned their homes, either free or mortgaged, whereas 74.3 per cent hired them.

These figures of the children and urban populations and of the housing conditions suggest the magnitude of the problems involved. But the problems multiply when the various aspects of childhood are borne in mind.

If we view the child problem from the point of age, there are the infant, the child just before going to school, the school child, and the child that after school may have gone to work. If we view the child from the point of view of its activities, there are the play child, the study child, and the work child.

If we view it from the point of view of its parental relations, we have the child of living parents, the orphan, the child of criminal parents or parent, the illegitimate child or foundling, and the child of pauper parents. Or, if we view it from the point of view of the place of its upbringing, we have the child in its parents' home, the child brought up in an institution, and the child brought up in the home of others.

Or we may view the child from the physical point of view, in which case, as related to each of the periods of babyhood, preschool childhood, school childhood, and work childhood, we have the problems of disease and physical disability due to heredity, general environment, or to ignorance or carelessness. From the moral point of view we have to do with juvenile delinquents, with the merits of probation systems, with juvenile courts, with institutional effects, and with the proper direction of children's interests and efforts. On the moral side of the child there are also questions of heredity and environment; heredity, as related to diseases of parents; environment, as involving, apart from contact with persons in the household or institution, life in large cities—e. g., in tenements—life in smaller cities and in country districts, and as demanding more suitable opportunity for the development of what are called the "natural instincts" of childhood. Concerned with the children of the very poor there are, further, the questions of effective relief and assistance. In the foregoing I have mentioned nothing of a purely educational character, as that is the well-established function of the Bureau of Education, nor have I referred to religious influences; but the several view points suggest the existence of many problems and their urgent importance.

Let me now indicate more particularly under the several topics mentioned in the bill some of the conditions and problems that do or that, unknown to us, may confront us and some of the remedies suggested. The instances will, I hope, excite your interest and enlist your support of the bill.

INFANT MORTALITY.

The magnitude of this scourge is readily shown by the figures of the last report on mortality statistics published by the Census Bureau (1906). In the registration area, which now covers about half the population, there were 212,738 deaths of children under 15 years of age. But of these 133,105 were of infants under 1 year. They formed 20 per cent of the deaths of those of all ages. According to the last census, for the year ended May 1, 1900, the deaths, by age periods, per 1,000 of population were:

Under 1 year	165.4
Under 5 years	52.1
From 5 to 14 years	4.3

The following table, taken from the Twelfth Census, shows the decreases in death rates from 1890 to 1900, but the continuance of a higher proportionate death rate in cities than in the country and the tremendous death rate for the young children:

Death rates per 1,000 population at certain ages, 1890 and 1900.

Year.	Registration States.							Cities in registration States.
	All ages.	Under 5 years.	5 to 14 years.	15 to 44 years.	45 to 64 years.	65 years and over.	Unknown.	All ages.	Under 5 years.	5 to 14 years.	15 to 44 years.	45 to 64 years.	65 years and over.	Unknown.
1890	19.5	64.5	5.3	9.4	21.3	76.6	33.7	22.2	80.4	6.2	10.8	26.3	88.6	20.7
1900	17.3	49.9	3.8	7.9	20.3	82.8	25.3	18.6	59.7	4.3	8.8	24.3	90.9	15.9

How to lessen this tremendous infant mortality is a problem worthy of all the information that can be received, gathered, and analyzed by such a bureau as that which is proposed.

Strangely enough, rich and poor children come into the world substantially on an equality. They are "created equal." The inequalities occur after they have arrived in the world. That rich and poor come into the world on a substantial equality is interestingly set forth in the report of the British interdepartmental committee on physical deterioration. That committee was appointed to study the reasons for the poor physique of the recruits furnished to the British army in the Boer war. If for humane reasons we are opposed to war, let us for humane reasons also provide a bureau now to collate similar facts in this country, so important a bearing have they on the public welfare.

On this subject that committee said (and I have italicized some of the language):

So far as the committee are in a position to judge, the influence of heredity in the form of the transmission of any direct taint is not a considerable factor in the production of degenerates.

Professor Cunningham's views, that inferior bodily characters, the result of poverty and not of vice, are not transmissible, were confirmed by Doctor Mackenzie, who at the outset of his interesting evidence elaborated a distinction between inheritable characters and their environmental modifications, the result of these last being imposed on the individual by his life history and not therefore transmissible to the offspring. Doctor Eichholz was disposed to go further, and sought to explain how some mysterious law of transmitted impulse made for the recuperation of each generation, the unborn child fighting strenuously for its own health at the expense of the mother and arriving in the world with a full chance of living a normal physical existence. This view he supported by the assertion that the number of children born healthy in the worst districts was very great, he himself putting it at not less than 90 per cent. Doctor Ashby thought this was only partially true, as nature too often failed in its effort; and Doctor Mackenzie would not even concede so much, as investigations into the effect of food on guinea pigs during pregnancy had, he said, shown that the embryo suffers in greater proportion than the mother. He quoted the opinion of Dr. Noel Paton that "the nourishment of the maternal tissues seems to take precedence over the nutrition of the fetus."

The committee deemed it advisable to hear on this point Dr. Edward Malins, president of the Obstetrical Society of London and professor of midwifery in the University of Birmingham, who thought the testimony of experienced persons was on the whole in accordance with the views expressed by Doctor Eichholz. He would say that from 80 to 85 per cent of children were born physically healthy, whatever the condition of the mother might be antecedently, so far confirming the opinion that nature intends all to have a fair start. Doctor Malins kindly undertook on behalf of the Obstetrical Society to institute an inquiry among the lying-in charities and hospitals in London which should furnish information on these facts; this inquiry is unfortunately not complete. The committee were, however, supplied by the courtesy of Doctor Eichholz with evidence which did tend to establish this conclusion from the medical officers working for the Royal Maternity Charity, and from the Paddington and Kensington Workhouse infirmaries.

The committee can not ignore these opinions, though it may well be that the depressing effects of the life struggle on parents are, nevertheless, in some measure transmitted to the offspring. At any rate, some vulnerability toward disease may coexist with a superficially healthy appearance, and granted unfavorable environment the seeds of degeneration are not long in producing a rank harvest. The consolation of the doctrine lies in the encouragement it gives to working for the removal of the causes which are prejudicial to the health of each successive generation, an encouragement which is immensely strengthened by the concurrent testimony of all concerned as to the immediate effect upon growth and development brought about by the withdrawal of even the most unpromising material from noxious surroundings.

If infants of the rich and poor come into the world on a substantial equality, they die with an inhuman inequality.

A German investigator found that for every 1,000 children born among the working classes 505 died in the first year; among the middle classes 173 died in the first year; and among the higher classes only 89 died during the first year. Doctor Drysdale, of the Metropolitan Free Hospital, London, declared that the death rate of infants among the rich was not more than 8 per cent, while among the very poor it was often as high as 40 per cent. Doctor Playfair said that 18 per cent of the upper, 36 per cent of the tradesmen, and 55 per cent of the working classes die under the age of 5 years. On this point the recent report of the President's homes commission has some data:

High infantile mortality rates have always been considered the opprobrium of the healing art. Dickson asked, over fifty years ago, "How shall we present the early extinction of half the newborn children of men?" While powerless to solve all the mysteries connected with this subject, an attempt will be made to answer the practical question, Can they be reduced? Space will not permit to enter into detail of infant hygiene, but we must at least point out the fact that the mortality can be greatly reduced by improving the original stock, i. e., the physique and habits of the parents, and placing them as well as their offspring under more suitable environment, especially with reference to fresh air, sunlight, exercise, suitable clothing and habitations, and last, but not least, proper food.

The influence of favorable hygienic conditions was demonstrated by Casper's statistics, published as early as 1825, showing that the infant mortality rate among royal children was only 57, as compared with 345 per 1,000 among the infants of the poor. Of 170 deaths from infantile diarrhea, investigated by Helle in Graz in 1903 and 1904, not one belonged to a rich family, and but 9 to the well-to-do class, while 161 belonged to the poor and the very poor. Clay calculates that of every 100 children born in England, 90 will be alive at the end of the first year of those born in aristocratic families, 79 in the mercantile class, and 68 among the laboring classes. The relation of infantile mortality to the occupation of the women has already been discussed in a previous report.

Dr. George Reid, at the National Conference of Infantile Mortality, held in London in June, 1906, contrasted the infantile mortality in two districts, identical in health conditions, but with the important difference that in one women are largely employed in industrial pursuits, and in the other there is practically no employment for them, with the result that the infantile mortality varied from 149 to 198 per 1,000.

The infantile mortality returns in the United States also indicate that we are dealing with a class mortality, which is highest in communities where women are employed in mills and other gainful occupations, and in consequence the children fall victims to ignorance and neglect. Contrast, for example, the census rates for 1900 of Fall River, Mass. (304.7); Lowell, Mass. (275.5); Nashua, N. H. (261.2); Lawrence, Mass. (246.5); Manchester, N. H. (238.4), all typical mill towns, with the rate at Cambridge, Mass., which was 186.5.

That the work of the women has much to do with large infant mortality, as indicated by the reference to American conditions at the end of the foregoing extract, was curiously instanced when Paris was besieged by the German army. There was the most frightful poverty due to unemployment, and yet the mortality of infants decreased 40 per cent, due probably to the fact that the mothers had time to stay at home. Very much the same thing happened during the great cotton famine in Lancashire. But ever in civilized and industrial America instances occur of the birth of children in the factory amid the whirr of the machinery. Exemption of women from work for some time prior and subsequent to childbirth was one of the reforms sought for rural Russia in the recent revolution in that country.

Bad housing conditions are another potent cause of infant mortality. An investigation of 2,711 infantile deaths in Berlin showed that 1,792 occurred in one-room apartments, 754 in two-room apartments, 122 in three-room apartments, and 43 in apartments of four rooms and over.

In the special reports recently made to the President in regard to affairs in the District of Columbia it is said:

It is a well-established fact that infant mortality is very much greater in overcrowded houses. Mr. Thompson says: "Infant mortality varies almost arithmetically with housing conditions. Although children under 5 years are only one-ninth of the population, they furnish one-third of the deaths."

That the death rate in cities is largely influenced by the number of occupants to a room has been repeatedly demonstrated by sanitary statistics. Mr. Russell in his statistics of Glasgow (1871 to 1880) found that the general mortality was 21.7 per thousand, when the average occupancy per room was 1.31; when the average was 2.05 for each bedroom the mortality increased to 26.6 per thousand. It can readily be understood that the closer people are crowded together the greater will be the liability for the transmission of infectious diseases, such as diphtheria, scarlet fever, tuberculosis, and so forth. And when they live in an atmosphere which is vitiated by the emanations from the lungs and bodies of human beings, with insufficient ventilation and a deficient supply of sunlight—nature's great disinfecting agent—their susceptibility to infection is greatly increased. In his investigations made in Budapest, Korosi found that the mortality from infectious disease was 20 per thousand when there were only two occupants per room; where the number was from three to five the mortality was 29 per thousand, and where it was from six to ten the mortality increased to 32 per thousand.

* * * * * * *

Doctor Kober, in his History and Development of the Housing Movement in the City of Washington, D. C., refers to the death rate among the tenants of the Washington Sanitary Improvement Company as follows:

We have shown that death rates go hand in hand with bad housing conditions. In some cases the general death rate for large groups of population living in insanitary dwellings amounts to double or even treble what might be called a reasonable death rate.

On the other hand, the vital statistics of London show that the death rate "in the improved dwellings for wage-earners" is far below the general mortality of the city, and the experience of the Washington Sanitary Improvement Company is even more gratifying. During the year ending March 31, 1906, the apartments were occupied by 778 adults and 380 children; total, 1,158; births, 39, and only 8 deaths—a death rate of about 7 per thousand—which, with all due allowance for the average age of the occupants, shows a remarkably low mortality when compared with the general death rate among the white population, viz, 15.16 per thousand.

That ignorance and indifference also played an important part in infantile mortality were conclusions reached by the British committee that I mentioned before. In addition to finding that such mortality had not decreased in that country during the last twenty-five years, despite the considerable fall in the general death rate, the committee said:

Coming to particulars illustrative of these conditions, Mr. Wilson, speaking of Dundee, said: "It was quite a common thing to find a woman had had as many as 13 children, and had lost 11 or 12 out of that number, in some cases the whole of them." Mrs. Greenwood, in a paper submitted relating to Sheffield, says: "One woman I know has buried 17 out of 18 children, another has had 16 sons, of whom only 6 are living," though neither of them had worked out of their homes since marriage. Nor, in her opinion, is such waste necessarily connected with poverty; deaths from diseases of the respiratory organs constantly occur, owing to the practice of even well-to-do mothers exposing imperfectly clad children to cold while gossiping with neighbors. Among a certain number of mothers questioned in Hanley and Longton, it appeared that 38 per cent of the children born to them had died in infancy, and the state of the case in many Lancashire towns is certainly no better; thus in Burnley one woman is said to have had 20 children and buried 16, all having died between 1 and 11 months of age; in this case the father was a collier in good wages and the mother stayed at home.

The purity of the milk supply has a very important bearing on infantile mortality, as all know. A recent experience in Washington illustrates this. On April 15, 1908, there was opened at Neighborhood House, in southwest Washington, a milk-distributing depot and dispensary for infants and young children, and the following is from his report:

Dispensaries for children are not uncommon here, but milk depots where clean, pure milk, properly modified to suit individual needs, can be obtained have never been tried in Washington, though other cities have operated them successfully for several years.

Neighborhood House had become much concerned over the large amount of illness among infants in this section during the summer months of 1906 and 1907 and the alarmingly high mortality.

An investigation into the causes of these unfavorable conditions proved that the largest part of the illness among these children and the great majority of infant deaths was caused by digestive disturbances, the result of improper food, wrong feeding methods, and carelessness or lack of knowledge in the handling and preparation of infant foods.

To correct this state of affairs as much as possible, those interested planned and put in operation the following lines of work:

A milk station was located at Neighborhood House, at which, at a nominal cost, clean, pure milk, properly modified, can be obtained for infants needing it.

* * * * * * *

During the months of June, July, August, and September of 1907, 50 white children, 10 years of age or under, died in southwest Washington alone. During the same period in 1908 only 29 white children, 10 years of age or under, have died in this section, although this year was considered one of the most fatal to children that we have ever experienced. The dispensary feels that it is entitled to at least a part of the credit for this great reduction in mortality through the furnishing of clean, pure milk and the large amount of preventive work which it has done.

What could this bureau do in regard to infant mortality? Would not bulletins published by it and sent broadcast by Members, especially to city constituents, be a tremendous stimulus to legislation by the States regulating the labor of women, to better housing in the cities, to effective inspection of milk, and to a greater regard for human life? Their publication would be no interference with the States, but would aid the States. Considering what we do for cattle, what objection can there be to having the National Government do this much, that not "one of these little ones should perish?"

BIRTH RATE.

Very few birth-rate statistics are kept in this country. Only estimates can be made, and those at the time of the decennial censuses. The last study of this subject made for the Bureau of the Census says:

The number of people in any given place on a certain date is determined by a census, but to ascertain the birth rate it is needful also to know the total number of births occurring in the year of which the census day is the middle. This number is not given by a census, and hence no census of itself can furnish the information needed to compute a birth rate. Neither is there in the United States nor in any considerable part of it any effective agency for securing this information. As a result, the birth rate of the population of the United States, present or past, is unknown.

The information conveyed by a birth rate is of fundamental importance in the discussion of many economic and social questions. For this reason, in default of direct information regarding the birth rate of the United States, efforts have been made to compute it by indirect methods of approximation and to ascertain whether it is stationary or changing, and if the latter, in what direction and how rapidly. The results of these efforts have been far from satisfactory and convincing.

The two methods used by the census to get at the birth rate and the conclusions reached are shown in the following extracts from the foregoing study:

The table shows that at the beginning of the nineteenth century children under 10 years of age constituted one-third and at the end less than one-fourth of the population. A decline in the proportion of children began as early as the decade 1810 to 1820 and continued almost uninterruptedly but by very different amounts until 1900. The average decrease has been about 1 per cent in a decade. The greatest decreases occurred in the decades 1840 to 1850 and 1880 to 1890. This was probably due to the enormous immigration, which swelled the adult population with great rapidity. For the decade 1880 to 1890 this factor may have been reenforced by the change in the form of the age question, although the influence of this upon the number of children under 10 is uncertain. The next largest decrease was in the decade from 1860 to 1870, when the direct and indirect effects of the civil war reduced the proportion of children. But this decrease was accentuated by the serious omissions of that census, especially in the Southern States and among the negroes, for whom the proportion of children is very high.

The figures as a whole suggest that there has been an almost uninterrupted but irregular decrease in the birth rate from near the beginning of the nineteenth century. They do not prove this, for the decrease might be explained by the increasing vitality of the population, leading to a longer average duration of life and consequently the survival of a larger number of adults.

PROPORTION OF CHILDREN TO POTENTIAL MOTHERS.

Continental United States.—The method of estimating the proportion of children, by comparing them with the number of women of child-bearing age, may be applied for the period 1850 to 1900. This method has two advantages over the preceding. It makes it possible to limit the children to those under 5 years of age and to exclude from the second term of the comparison all males and the females not of child-bearing age. Under these conditions any decrease in the proportion of children which the figures may show could not be explained as due to the increased vitality and longevity of the adult population. The limits of child-bearing age are usually assumed as 15 and 44, but for the earlier censuses the limits must be taken as 15 and 49. The figures are as follows:

TABLE II.—Number of children under 5 years of age to each 1,000 females 15 to 49 years of age and decrease in the number during the preceding ten and twenty years, 1850 to 1900.

Census.	Number of children under 5 years of age to 1,000 females 15 to 49 years of age.	Decrease in number during—
		Preceding ten years.	Preceding twenty years.
Continental United States:
1900	474	11	85
1890	485	74	87
1880	559	13	75
1870	572	62	54
1860	634	[a] 8	----------
1850	626	----------	----------

[a] Increase.

The proportion of children increased from 1850 to 1860, and then decreased without a break, but by very unequal amounts. The last column of the table has been introduced to call attention to the comparatively uniform decrease by twenty-year periods. The slight decrease from 1870 to 1880 was probably due in part to serious omissions in 1870 among the population having a large proportion of children. The slight decrease from 1890 to 1900 was probably due in part to the great prosperity of the country between 1890 and 1900, especially in the last years of the decade, in part to the many children born to the millions of immigrants of the preceding decade, and in part, also, to the change in the form of the age question.

In 1900 there were only three-fourths as many living children to each 1,000 potential mothers as in 1860. The assumption that there has been a progressive increase in the inaccuracy of the censuses leading to omissions of larger and larger proportions of children is too improbable for serious refutation, and yet no other alternative can be suggested by aid of which to escape the conclusion that the birth rate has declined persistently since 1860.

Birth-rate statistics are desirable for understanding and apprising ourselves of national tendencies and problems, but they are still more important to each community. This bureau would stimulate communities to secure birth-rate statistics. Those statistics would suggest the need of intensive studies, local and national. This bureau would be a stimulus to local studies, a central bureau of information for all localities to learn of others, and an expert body competent to compare conditions and draw conclusions.

PHYSICAL DEGENERACY.

The conditions described in connection with infant mortality have indicated some of the bad conditions that exist illustrative of physical degeneracy. Physical degeneracy is not necessarily inherited retrogressive deterioration. The distinction and some of the conditions in England are set forth in the British report hereinbefore referred to:

The evidence of Doctor Eichholz contains a summary of his conclusions on this point, so admirably epitomizing the results of a comprehensive survey of the whole subject that the committee can not do better than reproduce it in full at this stage of their report:

1. I draw a clear distinction between physical degeneracy on the one hand and inherited retrogressive deterioration on the other.

2. With regard to physical degeneracy, the children frequenting the poorer schools of London and the large towns betray a most serious condition of affairs, calling for ameliorative and arrestive measures, the most impressive features being the apathy of parents as regards the school, the lack of parental care of children, the poor physique, powers of endurance, and educational attainments of the children attending school.

3. Nevertheless, even in the poorer districts, there exist schools of a type above the lowest, which show a marked upward and improving tendency, physically and educationally, though the rate of improvement would be capable of considerable acceleration under suitable measures.

4. In the better districts of the towns there exist public elementary schools frequented by children not merely equal but often superior in physique and attainments to rural children. And these schools seem to be at least as numerous as schools of the lowest type.

5. While there are, unfortunately, very abundant signs of physical defect traceable to neglect, poverty, and ignorance, it is not possible to obtain any satisfactory or conclusive evidence of hereditary physical deterioration—that is to say, deterioration of a gradual retrogressive permanent nature, affecting one generation more acutely than the previous. There is little, if anything, in fact, to justify the conclusion that neglect, poverty, and parental ignorance, serious as their results are, possess any marked hereditary effect, or that heredity plays any significant part in establishing the physical degeneracy of the poorer population.

6. In every case of alleged progressive hereditary deterioration among the children frequenting an elementary school, it is found that the neighborhood has suffered by the migration of the better artisan class or by the influx of worse population from elsewhere.

7. Other than the well-known specifically hereditary diseases which affect poor and well-to-do alike, there appears to be very little evidence on the prenatal side to account for the widespread physical degeneracy among the poorer population. There is, accordingly, every reason to anticipate rapid amelioration of physique so soon as improvement occurs in external conditions, particularly as regards food, clothing, overcrowding, cleanliness, drunkenness, and the spread of common practical knowledge of home management.

8. In fact, all evidence points to active, rapid improvement, bodily and mental, in the worst districts, so soon as they are exposed to better circumstances, even the weaker children recovering at a later age from the evil effects of infant life.

Physical degeneracy exists likewise in this country. It is due to various causes, such as bad housing, poor food, bad air, neglect, and ignorance. Nor are the well-to-do or the country children free from these defects.

Suggestive of conditions everywhere are some of the observations made by the committee on physical welfare of school children which investigated the home conditions of 1,400 New York school children who were found by school physicians to have physical defects. The report of that committee says:

The overcrowding indicated that whatever might be our conventional ideas of the dependence line, physical defects must be expected in children where three out of four families have four rooms or less for cooking, working, washing, sleeping:

	Per cent.
6 families live in 1 room	0.29
232 families live in 2 rooms	11
761 families live in 3 rooms	36.2
759 families live in 4 rooms	36.1
244 families live in 5 rooms	11.6

* * * * * * *

1. If New York school children are typical of school children in the United States, there must be in the schools of this country 12,000,000 children having physical defects more or less serious that should receive attention from parents and family physicians.

2. If the 1,400 children whose physical defects and home conditions as here reported are representative of the school children in New York City and in the United States, they must be handicapped by—

	In New York City.	In United States.
Malnutrition	41,600	1,248,000
Enlarged glands	182,000	5,460,000
Bad teeth	299,600	8,988,000
Bad teeth only	83,200	2,496,000
Defective breathing	236,400	7,092,000

* * * * * * *

4. Few of the defects can be corrected by nourishment alone. Plenty of fresh air outside school building and home will not entirely counteract the results of bad ventilation and bad light within school building and home. Country children have adenoids, bad teeth, and malnutrition. Plenty of food will not prevent bad teeth and bad ventilation from causing adenoids, enlarged tonsils, and malnuitrition.

* * * * * * *

5. Neither race nor nationality affords proof against physical defects (Table II). Children whose parents have long resided in the United States need attention quite as much as the recent immigrant (Table IV). American mothers reported the greatest prevalence of tuberculosis and the highest number of miscarriages. American and German children have the largest number of ailments, more particularly measles and whooping cough. Americans and Germans also have the largest number of dark rooms.

* * * * * * *

17. Inadequate medical care is given children (Table XXXVIII). Families with incomes of $20 a week or more rely upon patent medicines, mother's remedies, and the prospect of children outgrowing ailments when they should consult private physicians.

* * * * * * *

d. The causes of physical defects are not confined to "marginal" incomes, but, while more apt to be present in families having small incomes, are found among all incomes wherever there exist bad ventilation, insufficient outdoor exercise, improper light, irregular eating, overeating, improper as well as insufficient food, lack of medical, dental, and ocular attention.

* * * * * * *

f. To remove physical defects, causal conditions among all income classes should be treated, and not merely symptoms revealed at school by children of the so-called "poor."

* * * * * * *

g. A comprehensive plan for removing physical defects of school children would involve the following steps:

* * * * * * *

(6) Physical examination of children when applying for work certificates. (7) Use of information gained regarding general living conditions to secure enforcement of health and tenement laws, restriction of hours of labor, control of dangerous trades, prevention of exploitation of women and children.

A similar study was made in Washington for the President's homes commission, and the report of that commission says:

From this table we learn that out of 43,005 pupils in the graded schools 13,407 were colored and 29,598 were white. Among the colored children 3,784 instances of the defects listed in the table were encountered, or a relation of 28.2 per cent; among the white pupils 11,520 notations of defects, a relation of 38.9 per cent to the whole, were encountered. The difference in percentage of defects between white and colored children is solely due to better condition of the teeth in the colored children. Total defects noted, 15,304, or 35.5 per cent of the pupils examined. These percentages, high as they may appear, are very much lower than the rates reported from New York.

Omitting from this consideration the 6,698 pupils who probably needed only dental care—a matter of importance, however, to the general health—we still have to deal with 8,606 pupils, or 20 per cent of the total, whose physical condition should be a matter of grave concern to the parents. Of this number 149 were crippled, 272 deformed, 461 had strabismus (squint), 312 had discharging ears, 835 defective hearing, 2,176 defective vision, 2,062 were "mouth breathers," 703 were undersized, 727 ill nourished, and 934 were anæmic.

It was not deemed best to conduct physical examinations involving the removal of clothing, and hence the number of ruptured children could not be determined; but, judging from the reports of the agents of the Associated Charities, the number is sufficiently great for serious consideration.

It will be readily conceded that every crippled or deformed child should, if possible, be spared from permanent disability, and no thoughtful parent should hesitate to act when attention is directed to the serious consequences of neglect. Poverty is no excuse for the "do-nothing system," as the medical charities offer adequate facilities for treatment of persons unable to pay for the same.

Nor is there an excuse for not attempting to cure discharging ears, defective hearing or vision, since every observer is familiar with the sad consequences of such defects in the ultimate struggle for existence. Parents may not know that a child afflicted with a squint, harelip, or cleft palate may be transformed into a vicious character, because it is the object of constant ridicule within and without school, and that all of this could be avoided by a timely operation. Parents are probably not aware that many of the nervous affections and even mental defects in boys are due to some slight malformation of the genital organs, for which the Hebrews instituted circumcision. Nor is it generally known that anæmic and ill-nourished children and those suffering from enlarged tonsils, cervical glands, or post-nasal growths, and the majority of "mouth breathers" are peculiarly susceptible to disease in general and to tuberculosis in particular.

I submit that bulletins on such physical defects, their seriousness and means of correction, which bulletins could be sent as widespread as are farmers' bulletins, would infringe no rights of the States, but would be an enormous stimulus to parents and municipalities, and at slight expense work vast good for the public welfare. It is not sufficient to wait until the children go to school. The remedies should be applied early.

Members representing country districts may incline to the belief that these conditions are peculiarly city conditions and do not concern country people. That was not the British experience, may not be the experience of the large manufacturing sections in the North Atlantic and North Central divisions, and may not in the future be the experience of the new manufacturing districts in the South.

The British committee said:

Another factor in the alleged deterioration of the people, connected like the last with their aggregation in towns, is said to be the withdrawal from the rural districts of the most capable of the population, leaving the inferior types to supply their place and continue the stock, the evil being often aggravated, in the opinion of some, by the drifting into the country of the debilitated town population which is crowded out by the inrush of more vigorous elements.

There appears on the face of it to be considerable probability that both these movements are in operation. The effect of certain conditions of town life on the weaker members of the community, and the selective tendency of certain classes of employment which creates a demand for men of greater physical efficiency than is to be found as a rule in a town-bred population, are constantly drawing upon the resources of the rural districts, and it is presumably the men of most energy, and possibly of finer physique, that respond to the allurements offered them.

Thus, after describing the splendid men to be found working as navvies, pig-iron carriers in blast furnaces, bleaching-powder packers, cement workers, laborers in steel-plate mills, and steel smelters, occupations which are not only exceedingly arduous, but throw a severe strain on the powers of endurance and speedily sift out the inefficients, Mr. Wilson says:

"The vast majority of these workers are country bred and have grown to maturity in farm or outdoor work."

Mr. Fosbroke, medical officer of health to the Worcestershire county council, whose evidence was exclusively concerned with the conditions of health in the rural district with which he is familiar, had no doubt that, notwithstanding better wages, better housing, and better feeding, the physique of the agricultural laborer had deteriorated owing to the depletion of the rural population by the exodus of the best types into the towns. In practical proof of this allegation he stated:

"That thirty years ago it was the commonest thing for a laborer to carry 2¼ hundredweight of corn up a ladder; now you very seldom see it. Farmers tell me the same."

And again—

"Generally the farmers say that the men are of a weaker type altogether. The more robust men go into the towns."

So far as the cities are concerned many of these unhappy conditions can be remedied. The care that Germany has exercised over German children has had a marked effect in making German conditions superior to English conditions among like classes of the population. In Gorst's The Children of the Nation it is related that in 1905 the brass workers of Birmingham sent a deputation to Berlin for the purpose of comparing the condition of the brass workers of the two cities. They were greatly impressed with the cleanliness and tidiness of the children playing about the streets, courts, and squares of Berlin. Of all the thousands of children there was not one who was not neat, clean, and tidy. In the public school of a quarter inhabited by the poor classes they saw no case of poorly fed or untidy children, either in the streets or in the school. The good condition of the children was due to the medical inspection in the school and to supplying the needy with food. On the other hand, when they visited a school in a similar neighborhood in Birmingham, the children were mostly dirty and tattered. A large number wore very bad boots, not clean, and some with soles so dilapidated that the toes showed through. The physique of the children was puny. "The morning was warm and although the windows were wide open the smell was oppressive and unclean. * * * There were many underfed children."

There is much ignorance of ordinary but essential facts in connection with the physical and nervous welfare of children which this bureau would tend to dispel. Mrs. Frances S. Bolton, in an address on The Physical Rights of the Child, said:

How many mothers know that a child grows most when he is asleep, and that only during sleep is nervous force accumulated and at all other times it is being spent? How many know that each little baby must pass through all the stages of the evolution of the race? I desire here to enter my plea for more and yet more knowledge of the physical care of children by the so-called "educated, up-to-date mothers." To a child with a good, sound, perfectly healthy body all things are possible in mental and spiritual development, but without perfect physical health little can even be hoped for.

Let me call your attention to a couple of instances of physical infirmity, from much of which children could be relieved effectually if there was widespread knowledge.

First. Deafness of children.—The time-honored custom has been to put deaf children in institutions and teach them to speak and understand only the sign language. Pennsylvania recently established an institution that takes the very young and teaches them to read the lips, avoids the use of the sign language, and equips them to enter school and live and vie with other children. Said Hon. J. B. Showalter, ex-state senator of Pennsylvania, in addressing the National Congress of Mothers and delegates to the International Congress on the Welfare of the Child:

The early training in speech and language of the deaf child is one of the most, if not most, important subjects to which your attention will be called during your congress. The opportunities for this training at present are meager, and the reasons for this are simply a lack of knowledge on the subject upon the part of the people. Did every mother know that the deaf child can be taught to speak and converse, that the reason he does not speak is because he has not been taught to speak, that if he had the same amount of repetition through the eye as the hearing child receives through the ear, the results would be the same. He would learn to talk and converse just the same as a hearing child. That the time to commence his training is in infancy. Did every mother, did every intelligent person in our own and other lands, know these facts, I take it it would only be a short time till homes similar to the one in Philadelphia would be established in every State and country. America is indebted to Europe for the idea that deaf children could be taught speech.

Were it possible for the delegates to this congress to visit this home, now enlarged to two homes, and there see and converse with the sixty or more happy little tots from two years and up, I am as sure as I am of my own existence that every one of you would return to your homes fully persuaded that the oral method commenced early in life is the only way a deaf child should be taught, and you would not only be convinced of this fact, but you would become enthusiastic promoters of the measure, and that is just what it needs. People need to be told. Legislators need to be informed. Public sentiment needs to be educated.

To such a new method, the efficiency of which was established, this bureau could give tremendous impetus. Here, again, bulletins spread wide-cast would inform parents of the proper way to deal with deaf children, and the consequent happiness to these afflicted ones would beggar the gain from the durum wheat promoted by the Department of Agriculture, desirable though that be. Some will say this method will gain publicity and adoption without need of this bureau. The answer is that for over thirty years it has not. The oral method was discovered in the early seventies, as appears from an address of Dr. Charles S. Turnbull, in which he says:

In the first edition of Doctor Turnbull's work, entitled "Diseases of the Ear," he devoted a chapter to "deaf-mutism," which was a most comprehensive résumé of this interesting subject. It recorded its history and the results of his large experience, detailed accounts of his visits to the schools of this country and abroad, and concluded with an impartial review of all known methods, as early as the year 1871, and he quoted the following paragraph to illustrate Miss Garrett's method (Directions to Parents of Deaf Children, by Mary S. Garrett):

"Great results have already been gained through the oral method, and I have no doubt that greater and better results than any already obtained await us in the future, as the method becomes more widely and more strictly and intelligently applied. The oral pupil who has the least amount of intelligible speech and of lip reading compared with his fellow oral pupils has just that much advantage over the most expert maker of arbitrary signs and the manual alphabet, which are sure to be as unintelligible to the general public as our speech is to the sign maker."

He also alludes to the number of deaf children who are the descendants of the deaf, the marriages due, perhaps, to association in institutions:

Pause and reflect a moment when I tell you that one child is deaf out of every 1,500. Dr. Alexander Graham Bell tells us that over 50 per cent of 2,262 congenital deaf-mutes had deaf-mute relatives and even 13 per cent of the deaf from other (accidental) causes had deaf relatives.

* * * * * * *

The statistics of the Twelfth Census of the United States show that at least 4.5 per cent of the deaf of the country and 4.5 per cent of the blind are offspring of consanguineous marriages, but we do not know conclusively whether consanguinity in the parents produces the defective condition, or whether it simply intensifies a preexisting tendency in the family. The largest percentage of children of cousins marriages are found among the deaf who have deaf relatives (8.8 per cent), and among the blind (9.5 per cent) who have blind relatives.

This circumstance of hereditary danger is alluded to in the report of the Philadelphia institution mentioned above.

Also the deaf, when educated together during the period of adolescence and early adult life, naturally prefer each other's society, and frequent marriages between them result, and often their children or grandchildren are born deaf. We have illustrations of all of these causes of deafness among our pupils.

General publicity would forewarn against such a cause.

Second. Blindness of children.—In the pamphlet published by the special committee on the prevention of blindness of the New York Association for the Blind ft is said, and I have italicized some of the words:

It is an astounding fact—one not generally known—that one-quarter of all the blind children in all the blind schools of this country are unnecessarily blind.

The disease is known as ophthalmia neonatorum, or ophthalmia of the newborn, or infant ophthalmia. It is an infectious disease, appearing at the time of birth, easily preventable if precautionary measures are taken at once or within a few hours after birth; curable if when it develops skilled medical treatment can be secured quickly; fatal to sight if prompt preventive and curative measures are not taken, and ending in total blindness through the destruction of the eyeballs."

In the year 1906 there were 183,012 registered births in the State of New York, the disease appearing in one out of every 200 of these births—evidence of the alarming prevalence of the disease.

Twenty-eight years ago, in 1881, Professor Crede, of Leipzig, director of the maternity hospital connected with the university, announced the important discovery that a 2 per cent solution of nitrate of silver dropped, a single drop, into each eye of a newborn infant, would destroy the germs of ophthalmia neonatorum where these existed, and would not injure the sight of healthy eyes. Crede's figures show surprising results. In 1880, just before and just after the application of his newly discovered preventive measure, the percentage of ophthalmia fell from 7.4 per cent (14 cases out of 187 births) to 0.5 per cent (one case out of 200 births—and in this one case the disinfectant had not been used). Later he reports that out of 1,160 births during the three years, 1880–1883, but one case of infant ophthalmia had developed—possibly two.

The official census of the blind for the State of New York, taken in 1906, gives a total of 6,200 blind persons in the State. Of these, the cases of preventable blindness number 1,984 or 32 per cent of the whole. And of these preventable cases there are 620 classified as blindness caused by ophthalmia neonatorum, or 10 per cent of the whole number of blind persons in the State of New York.

In the United States there are between 6,000 and 7,000 persons who are totally blind because a simple precaution was not taken at the time of their birth.

The average of new admissions in these 10 schools for the blind shows that 25.21 per cent were victims of ophthalmia of the newborn.

In the Pennsylvania School for the Blind there were on an average for eight years 33⅓ per cent needlessly blind.

* * * * * * *

The preventive measure is within the capacity of every physician, of every intelligent midwife. It consists simply of the careful washing of all infants' eyes directly after birth, the dropping into each eye of a small portion of an inexpensive solution, obtainable from all druggists, harmless to healthy eyes, destructive of certain germs in diseased eyes—the one application. Just this simple treatment, nothing more, a treatment known to all physicians and presumably to all midwives.

We are inevitably led to the conclusion that to the criminal carelessness or ignorance of those who preside at the birth of the child is due the loss of sight of almost every child whose eyes have been destroyed by infant ophthalmia.

In Chicago, in 1904, we find 86 per cent of all births, principally among Italians, reported by midwives. In Buffalo, N. Y., with a population of about 400,000, nearly one-half of the births, in one year, were attended by midwives. In New York City, in 1905, 43,834 births, or 42 per cent of the whole number, were attended by midwives, employed largely by Italians, Austro-Hungarians, Polish Jews, and other immigrants. For the year 1907, in New York City, there were 68,186 births reported by physicians and 52,536 reported by midwives. In September, 1908, the registered midwives in the five boroughs of New York City numbered 1,382.

Miss Crowell examined 10,000 certificates of births and personally interviewed in their homes 500 midwives, or over one-half of those practicing at that time in the Borough of Manhattan, New York City. She says:

"Classifying according to nationality, I found that out of the 500 midwives, 27 per cent were Austro-Hungarians, Bohemians, Austrian Poles; 25 per cent Italians; 22 per cent Germans; 14 per cent Russians."

(Miss Crowell then goes on to describe the filthy condition of the midwives themselves and their equipment.)

To their effort it is due that, in all of our best conducted lying-in hospitals and in the maternity wards of general hospitals, the ophthalmia of infancy has greatly decreased. As instancing one only of many similar well-managed institutions, it is satisfactory to know that out of 4,000 births during a period of six years, at the Sloane Maternity Hospital, of New York City, where preventive methods are employed, not one case of infant ophthalmia had developed.

It may have been noticed that no figures are given in this paper relating to the cost of blindness. Roughly estimated, the average cost to the State of a person, blind from birth and dependent through life, approximates $10,000. But the data obtainable are too incomplete, too unsatisfactory to warrant any positive accurate statement.

It may also have been noticed that the only statistics used by the committee are those taken from the records of the causes of blindness in the reports of the schools for the blind. The schools are not obliged to keep such records—some of them do not—but these are the only perfectly accurate statistics we have, and upon these this reform movement is based.

Much more remains to be known. The census returns, carefully compiled, of 1906, give certain valuable figures; they do not give other facts and conditions which only authorized invetigation can furnish, and without which preventive work—much needed preventive work—can not be undertaken. For, in this age of trained philanthropic thought and action, when sentiment is followed by investigation, and investigation precedes reform, it is of the first importance that perfectly reliable information from official headquarters should be obtainable.

Does anyone wonder that the committee that published that report is anxious that this federal bureau for children's welfare shall be established. Is it not worth while that the Federal Government, with its great prestige and power of publicity, should spend some part of $52,000, if thereby it can make "the blind to see?"

ORPHANAGE.

On December 31, 1904, there were in the United States 92,289 inmates of orphan asylums and children's homes, and their annual maintenance cost $10,050,587. Out of every 100,000 inhabitants there were on an average 112.6 dependent children in institutions; the New York average being 317, Massachusetts, 160, and Illinois, 99. One of the problems of orphanage, as distinguished from the causes of orphanage, is the advantage of upbringing in homes of those willing to take the children as against bringing them up in institutions. The good effect of placing motherless infants in private homes was strikingly shown by the experience of two charitable societies in New York, the results of which are given in the following report, although as I have not the figures of the high death rate in the infant asylums it is not possible to make comparison.

As the work began on April 1, 1898, it had been carried on for a little over nine years and a summary of the results secured during that period will be of interest.

The number of children received by the committee from the city authorities, divided by classes and periods, has been as follows:

	Manhattan and Bronx.		Brooklyn.		Total.
	Foundlings.	Motherless and abandoned.	Foundlings.	Motherless and abandoned.
Apr. 1, 1898, to Apr. 1, 1899	68	----------	----------	----------	68
Apr. 1, 1899, to Apr. 1, 1900	36	----------	----------	----------	36
Apr. 1, 1900, to Apr. 1, 1901	47	----------	9	----------	56
Apr. 1, 1901, to Apr. 1, 1902	52	2	28	----------	82
Apr. 1, 1902, to Apr. 1, 1903	56	55	16	1	128
Apr. 1, 1903, to Apr. 1, 1904	49	49	9	3	110
Apr. 1, 1904, to Oct. 1, 1904	29	54	11	----------	94
Oct. 1, 1904, to Oct. 1, 1905	48	115	15	5	183
Oct. 1, 1905, to Oct. 1, 1906	53	78	16	1	148
Oct. 1, 1906, to June 17, 1907	41	36	17	1	95
Total	479	389	121	11	1,000

The mortality among these children, comparing the number of deaths with the total number under care each year, and including in each case all deaths of children in hospitals, is as follows:

April 1, 1898, to April 1, 1899	55.9
April 1, 1899, to April 1, 1900	31.1
April 1, 1900, to April 1, 1901	18.9
April 1, 1901, to April 1, 1902	10.7
April 1, 1902, to April 1, 1903	14.0
April 1, 1903, to April 1, 1904	10.0
April 1, 1904, to October 1, 1904	10.3
October 1, 1904, to October 1, 1905	11.3
October 1, 1905, to October 1, 1906	11.6
October 1, 1906, to June 17, 1907	6.5

No wonder that the people who effected that decrease in the mortality of infant orphans desire the establishment of a bureau which will be known to have its information available for the remotest community.

In connection with the burden that orphan children are to the State, Booker T. Washington, at the President's recent conference on dependent children, called attention to the lack of dependent children among colored people and the natural inclination of colored people to look after their own kind, except when they get to a place where they find that there is a fund to take care of them. He said that the total negro population in Alabama was about 900,000, but that there were only 301 colored children in institutions for the care of the dependent.

The cause of orphanage was also touched upon at that conference by Dr. Edward T. Devine, who said that he had to do with a particular inquiry in an industrial community in which during a single year 500 men met death by accidents, leaving families, here or abroad, dependent upon the state or charitable societies, and that in the same community 500 persons died of typhoid fever in the same year, using the illustration to show the peril to the home from such accidents and conditions.

The desultory remarks thus made by me as to orphanage none the less show the importance of it and the thousands of lives dependent for happiness on a proper dealing with its problems, based on ample knowledge such as this bureau would be a means of collating.

The orphans are not the only children who need care, in our cities at least. President Roosevelt, in opening the White House conference on the care of dependent children, said:

> There are half a dozen different types of children for whom we need to care. There is first of all the complete orphan, the child who has lost both father and mother. For this child we wish to make permanent provision. My own belief is that the best kind of permanent provision, if feasible, is to place that child in a home. We then have to meet the case—one of the most distressing of cases—where the father has died, where the breadwinner has gone, where the mother would like to keep the child, but simply lacks the earning capacity. Surely in such a case the goal toward which we should strive is to help that mother so that she can keep her own home and keep the child in it. That is the best thing possible to be done for that child. How the relief shall come, public, private, or by a mixture of both, in what way, you are competent to say and I am not. But I am competent to say what I think the goal should be. Then we come to the case of the child who must temporarily be taken away from the parent or parents, but where it is not desirable that the separation should be permanent. Those children offer cases for which the institution is peculiarly fitted. There are other problems, of course, that you will have to deal with; for instance, the crippled child, the child that can not be treated at home for a disease, but yet can be completely cured in a hospital, and the case of the child whose parents are hopelessly vicious or hopelessly inefficient. Here we must provide for the exercising of the greatest wisdom obtainable in knowing just where to draw the line, so as to know just when it becomes necessary to say that even the undoubted advantages of keeping the child in a pretty poor home, if that home is its own, are counterbalanced by the fact that the home has become not a source of benefit, but a source of menace and danger to the child. You will have to consider a dozen such problems.

This bureau would encourage States to require uniform statistics in regard to institutions and homes where children are placed and records which would show the progress, or lack of it, by the children while in the institution and after leaving it.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS AND JUVENILE COURTS.

The number of juvenile delinquents in institutions on June 30, 1904, was 23,034, distributed among 39 States and Territories. In the South Atlantic division the percentage of juvenile offenders that were white was 61, and of these the male percentage was 64 and the female 40. The colored percentage was 39, of which 36 were male and 59.8 female. On the other hand, in the South Central division the white was 68.5, of which the male was 63.5 and the female 88.7, and the colored was 34.5, of which the male was 36.5 and female 11.3. The census furnished these figures, but obviously can not give the reasons for the differences:

> Compare the number of juvenile delinquents with the general population, and we find that in the North Atlantic division 7.9 per cent of the delinquents were colored, as against a colored population of 1.9 per cent, but that in the South Atlantic division only 39 per cent were colored, as against a colored population of 35.8, and in the South Central division 31.5 per cent were colored, as against 30.3 per cent population.

Of the juvenile delinquents committed during 1904, 661 were from 7 to 9 years of age, 6,652 from 10 to 14, and 4,364 from 15 to 19 years of age. Having those figures, however, we are not much wiser when it comes to determining the best methods of dealing with juvenile delinquency and preventing its causes. Intensive investigations are necessary to those ends.

The advantage of juvenile courts was determined by this House when such a court was established for the District. But for its efficiency and progress is it not desirable to have available for study and comparison the records and experience of similar courts elsewhere, and would it not be an economy to States and municipalities to have here a central bureau of information where they could learn of the success, failure, and methods of each other's courts of similar character? If not from such a bureau, where could they get the information?

DESERTION AND ILLEGITIMACY.

Desertion is one of the puzzling problems of relief societies and of magistrates who must deal with deserted wives. Only a short while ago new legislation on this subject was enacted for the District. As the experience of others was valuable to the District, so should its experience and that of all be available for the information and instruction of all.

As to illegitimacy, the British report said: "The mortality among illegitimate children is enormously greater than among children born in wedlock." The following figures for European countries are given in the report of the President's homes commission, and show the difference in the mortality of legitimate and illegitimate children:

	Legitimate children.	Illegitimate children.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
France	15.0	30.0
Austria	22.9	35.1
Sweden	13.0	24.8
England	14.0	35.0

Infants are wards of the State none the less because they are illegitimate. Whatever a central bureau could do in the way of helping different localities to solve these problems would only be in the fulfillment of the high duty of the National Government.

DANGEROUS OCCUPATIONS.

Some of these are strikingly set forth in an address delivered by Mr. Edwin W. De Leon, first vice-president of the Casualty Company of America, in which he says:

> Accidents to working children are due largely to illiteracy and the incapacity to understand and appreciate the dangerous features of industrial life. The failure to read and comprehend rules and warning signs in factories is one of the most prolific sources of injury. Another frequent cause is the inclination to play around dangerous machinery, "skylarking," as factory superintendents term it, which is oftentimes attended with tragic results. I recall a case that came under my personal observation less than six months ago, where a boy 16 years of age, in attempting to show some of his young fellow-employees how rapidly he could force sheets of cardboard through a press, caught his hand between the rolls, and before the power could be shut off his arm was crushed almost to the shoulder and had to be amputated in order to save his life.
> In another case a man who was employed in a large rolling mill secured a position for his 13-year-old boy on the rolls rolling steel bars. This boy got possession of a small hand mirror and amused himself by flashing the sunlight into the eyes of the men working near him. While doing this, on one occasion, he failed to turn in time to catch a bar when it came through the rolls. The red-hot bar struck the ground at his feet, coming in contact with one of his legs, and burned off the foot at the ankle.

Perhaps the most usual cause of accidents is the lack of experience of the operator and the want of proper instruction from the foreman or superintendent. In the majority of serious cases with which I have been concerned, the injured child had been employed only a few days or weeks, sometimes only a few hours, and was utterly lacking in experience, education, skill, or capacity to undertake the work. The inevitable result followed, generally the loss of one or more fingers, oftentimes the whole hand, occasionally the loss of an arm.

To illustrate, in Tennessee, a colored boy, presumed to be 14 years of age, but afterwards proven to be only 13, secured employment as the offbearer on a saw, but received no instructions as to work, or any warnings as to the dangers. On the second day of his employment he crawled under the saw table, and his left arm was terribly mangled by the saw. A suit resulted for $10,000 damages, and the jury returned a verdict for $1,000.

In a case in Ohio a boy scarcely 15 years of age was set to work in a woodworking plant, where his only duty was to carry away the material cut off by a saw nearly 6 feet in diameter. Having seen the operator of the saw endeavor to overcome the momentum after the power was shut off by pressing against the side of the saw with a stick, this boy attempted to do the same thing, which resulted in the loss of his right arm near the shoulder. A jury assessed his damages at $2,500.

In a case in Pennsylvania, a boy 12 years of age was employed to feed pieces of steel through a set of rolls while the same were in motion. Not being informed of the danger of this work, and being ignorant of the ordinary hazard of such employment, one of the rags with which he was working was caught into the rolls, and his left hand and arm were drawn into the rolls and so mangled as to necessitate the amputation of the arm about halfway between the wrist and elbow.

From the State of Washington, a case is reported of a boy 14 years of age, employed in a logging camp in which his father was superintendent. In spite of this fact, the boy was not properly warned as to the dangers of the work, and was injured so severely that it became necessary to amputate one of his legs at the thigh. A suit was started for $25,000 damages, which was afterwards settled by the payment of $2,300.

Such accidents are not confined to factories or mills, for a case is reported from Rhode Island where a boy under 16 years of age was employed in the laundry room of a department store, and his duties were to run the washer and extractor. While taking a blanket from the machine in some way his arm became caught, crushing it so badly that it had to be amputated. A suit for $15,000 was promptly begun, and is still unsettled; the plaintiff's claim is $4,000. * * *

* * * * * * *

Every policy insuring an employer of labor against loss from liability for accidents to his employees contains a clause exempting the insurance company from liability in case of an accident to or caused by any child employed contrary to law. The great force of this provision and its widespread influence as a deterrent against child labor is at once apparent. Legislation will corect this evil eventually, and public opinion can create a strong sentiment that will tend more and more to ameliorate the condition of working children, but selfish considerations of economy will ever be the most potent argument in favor of the employment of persons of legal age. Employers will come to realize in time, as many of them have already been convinced, that they can not afford to violate the child-labor laws of their State, for they not only incur a liability for damages thereby, but are unable to secure insurance to protect them against loss in such cases.

* * * * * * *

Only a certain amount of labor is possible to be, and is actually, got out of men, women, and children within the ordinary and reasonable limits of a working day, and the object of the regulations in factory acts is to create the greatest degree of efficiency and productiveness in every working unit. To employ children below the natural and normal age of creative ability, or to work them beyond the limits of their physical endurance, is to impair the commercial value of their efforts and to incur a debt with nature that neither the child nor the community may be able to liquidate in after years.

The problems presented by Mr. De Leon's remarks are not the ordinry ones of child labor where merely the question of age is involved. They present another phase; that of the kind of employment—dangerous, not necessarily unhealthy.

DISEASES OF CHILDREN OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

One of the most marked and typical of diseases of children of the working classes is rickets, which is described by Gorst in The Children of the Nation as a disease of infancy which lays hold of the child before it gets into school and makes its first appearance from six to twelve months after birth. The direct cause of the disease is bad feeding, and it results in the children being undersized and deformed; up to 7 years of age there is hope of recovery. He quotes a Doctor Hall, of Leeds, who found 50 per cent of the children in a poor Gentile school suffering from rickets; in a poor Jewish school 7 per cent; and in the good schools frequented by the children of well-to-do artisans, 8 per cent. He also refers to an examination in Manchester by Doctor Ashby of a lot of school children, who were selected for examination because of their inability to learn in class. Some were suffering from marked rickety deformities, being much undersized, with knock-knees and flat feet, while their mental state was much less than that of other children in spite of their having attended school. Many of the others were of poor physique, with curved or limp spines, and flat feet, due to rickets. In England there seems to be an apathy on the part of some of the working classes which makes it difficult to rouse them to action. That apathy is referred to by the committee mentioned before, which reported:

On the other hand, in large classes of the community there has not been developed a desire for improvement commensurate with the opportunities offered to them. Laziness, want of thrift, ignorance of household management, and particularly of the choice and preparation of food, filth, indifference to parental obligations, and drunkenness largely infect adults of both sexes and press with terrible severity upon their children. The very growth of the family resources, upon which statisticians congratulate themselves, accompanied as it frequently is by great unwisdom in their application to raising the standard of comfort, is often productive of the most disastrous consequences. "The people perish for lack of knowledge," or, as it is elsewhere put, "Lunacy increases with the rise of wages and the greater spending power of the operative class, while a falling wage rate is associated with a decrease of drunkenness, crime, and lunacy." Local authorities, moreover, especially in the rural districts, are often reluctant to use their powers, and in these circumstances progress, unless stimulated by a healthy public conscience in matters of hygiene, is slower than might be wished.

A bureau such as that proposed in this bill would not only stimulate communities to take measures that would reduce to a minimum the diseases peculiar to the working classes, but the investigations it might make would be available for every growing community that wished to avoid the disadvantages that in these respects older communities have suffered.

EMPLOYMENT.

The intensive investigation into the labor of women and children which the Commissioner of Labor, under special appropriation, is now making may answer many of the questions which suggest themselves in regard to employment that are raised by the census figures and common experience. But, as the commissioner testified before the committee reporting this bill that for another twenty years he would be unable to take up this subject again, it is eminently proper that it should be included in the list of matters to receive the attention of this bureau. The welfare of the 1,750,000 breadwinners under 15 years of age needs reporting annually, not every twenty years. Business men desire it. I insert here a letter to that effect from one of the best-known business houses in New York:

WILLIAM ISELIN & CO.,
New York, February 19, 1909.

The Hon. HERBERT PARSONS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am gratified to find that you are sponsor for House bill 24148, known as the "children's bureau bill." The house in which I am a partner represents over 200 textile mills and many of them among the most important in their branch of the business, and I have a large acquaintance among the managers of these companies. I am sure from many talks with them on the subject of child labor that they will all welcome legislation which would put the Government in possession of all facts concerning child labor and lead to an end of its abuses.

Very truly,

LINCOLN CROMWELL,
3 East Eighty-fourth street, New York.

The physical danger from child labor is indicated in the following portion of the report of the President's Homes Commission:

Quite apart from the fact that child labor is a menace to education, morals, and good citizenship, the effects of premature and involuntary labor upon the health and physical welfare of the child are extremely detrimental. Quetelet, in his Physique Sociale, as early as 1869 demonstrated that the muscles of the average child attain only at the age of 13 or 14 a certain amount of strength and capacity for work. Up to this time the muscular fibers contain a larger percentage of water, and in consequence are very tender and immature. Demetjeff, cited by Rubner, determined the lifting power of the arms and trunk at different ages of the working classes to be as follows:

Lifting power of the arms and trunk of the working classes at different ages.

Age.	Kilograms.	Age.	Kilograms.
14 years	82	30 to 35 years	150
16 years	101	35 to 40 years	160
18 years	128	40 to 50 years	148
20 to 29 years	140	50 to 60 years	134

These figures clearly indicate that the average boy at the age of 14 possesses about one-half the muscular strength of an average adult between 35 and 40 years of age.

As a consequence of imperfect muscular development, it is not surprising that a large percentage of young persons engaged in workshops, factories, or even at the writing desk or merchant's counter develop lateral curvature of the spine and other muscular deformities, not to mention general weakness and predisposition to rickets, tuberculosis, and other pulmonary diseases. All of the bad effects are naturally intensified by insanitary environment, especially when the occupations are attended by the inhalation of dust, injurious gases, and impure air.

Doctor Roberts examined 19,846 English boys and men. Of these, 5,915 belonged to the nonlaboring classes—schoolboys, naval and military cadets, medical and university students; 13,931 belonged to the artisan class. The difference in height, weight, and chest measurement, from 13 to 16 years of age, was as follows:

Dr. Annie S. Daniel, in speaking of her personal observations in New York, tells us that a child 3 years old can straighten out the leaves of tobacco and can stick together the materials which form the stems of artificial flowers; at 4 he can put the cover on paper boxes; between 4 and 6 he can sew on buttons and pull basting threads. A girl from 8 to 12 can finish trousers as well as her mother. After she is 12, if of good size, she can earn more money in a factory, because she will be accepted if her size justifies the evasion of the law. The boys practically perform the same labor as the girls, except that they leave home earlier and engage in street work, as peddlers, newsboys, or bootblacks. Doctor Daniel has actually seen two children under 3 years of age working in the tenements of New York—one, a boy 2½ years of age, assisting the mother and four other children under the age of 12 in making artificial flowers. "These children earn from 50 cents to $1.50 a week, obviously at the expense of health and education—rights which neither the parents nor the community nor the State have a right to withhold."

Its effect on young girls is also alluded to in the British report before mentioned:

Close attention seems to be needed in respect of the physical condition of young girls who take up industrial employment between the ages of 14 and 18. The conditions under which they work, rest, and feed doubtless account for the rapid falling off in physique which so frequently accompanies the transition from school to work.

The committee on physical welfare of school children in New York reprinted the article on "Anatomical or physiological age versus chronological age," by Dr. C. Ward Crampton, who, after showing how different the physiological age may be from the chronological, says:

CHILD LABOR.

The problem of child labor is clearly reduced to a formula by our fundamental thesis. It is proven that the mature are from 30 to 50 per cent stronger than the immature, and that pubescence marks the beginning of the period of rapid increase in weight and strength, regardless of the chronological age. On the merits of the case it is perfectly clear that the immature who are weak should not be allowed to work, and that the mature who are overwhelmingly more fit to work be allowed to engage in it. At present there is a division on the age basis which allows some immature to work and prevents some mature children from working, causing a hardship to many of both classes. This is wholly contrary to common sense, and the feeling of the community is justly against arbitrary method. This is being realized with becoming clearness, as is evidenced by the last report of Commissioner Draper, of the New York state education department (commissioner's special thesis; annual report, 1903; Our Children, Our School, and Our Industries), and by P. Tecumseh Sherman, in his report as commissioner of labor (New York State, 1907). The latter states: "There should be added to our law a requirement of a fixed minimum standard of physical development as a condition to granting a certificate of fitness to work in a factory.

RECOMMENDATION III.

Child-labor legislation should be based upon physiological age.

It is agreed that no child found physically defective or ill should be allowed to engage in any but the lightest tasks.

It thus appears that an age minimum is not the sole solution needed for the ill effects of child labor. The good of the children of the Nation will require constant inquiry into the effects of child labor.

There are other questions which are raised by the employment of children. Miss Jane Addams, in her inspiring book, Newer Ideals of Peace, points out that we have made no careful study of the effect upon children of the subdivided labor which many of them perform in factories, and says:

A child who remains year after year in a spinning room gets no instruction, but merely a dull distaste for work (p. 158).

She also says:

A modern state might rightly concern itself with the effect of child labor upon industry itself.

And she refers to the complaint that good workmanship can not be secured, due to a system which makes no demand upon originality, but puts large numbers of producers prematurely at work (pp. 162–163):

Let us realize before it is too late that in this age of iron, of machine tending, and of subdivided labor, we need as never before the untrammeled and inspired activity of youth (p. 174).

LEGISLATION AFFECTING CHILDREN IN THE SEVERAL STATES AND TERRITORIES.

Some of the greatest stimuli to state advancement along the lines of educational and labor legislation are the publications issued by those two bureaus, respectively, giving the recent legislation of the States on their subjects. The same would be true in this case. Imitation is one of the potent factors of civilization.

SUCH OTHER FACTS AS HAVE A BEARING UPON THE HEALTH, EFFICIENCY, CHARACTER, AND TRAINING OF CHILDREN.

Take, for instance, the effect of alcohol. Professor Demme's statistics of 10 temperate and 10 intemperate families, based upon ten years' study and observation, showed:

	Temperance families.	Drunkards' families.
Children	61	57
Died before 6 weeks old	5	25
Idiots	0	6
Stunted in growth	0	5
Epilepsy	0	5
Nervous in childhood, but cured	6	0
Ordinary good health in childhood, per cent	81.5	17.5

Said also the British committee:

It must be remembered that even Professor Cunningham, while denying the influence of heredity in most cases, expressed the firm belief that diseases such as syphilis and alcoholism transmit their effects to the third and fourth generation—and in this opinion the committee fully concur.

In the foregoing I have sought to instance for the benefit and interest of Members the kind of things that would concern this bureau. Naturally, what I have suggested is only a small part of the innumerable matters that would challenge the attention of the bureau. They serve to show, I hope, the importance of this bureau for the happiness of many and the welfare of the Nation.

OBJECTIONS.

Despite the need that I think I have shown for this bureau, some objections are made to it, and two are urged in the minority report of the committee.

One of the objections is that the States are doing the work now and that the "entrance of the National Government into this field should be followed by a loss of interest and a cessation of effort on the part of the States." Unfortunately, many of the States are not doing the work now. The registration area in the United States, from which we get our mortality statistics, only covers in population half of the United States, and in extent of territory only a small portion. Figures as to the birth rate are wanting almost everywhere. There have been very few inquiries into physical degeneracy or into desertion and illegitimacy. There has been and there is a tendency to legislation affecting the labor of children; but that legislation has come as the result of agitation from outside of the State as well as in, and will be furthered, and not hindered, by this bureau.

But, as I have shown, there is nothing in this bureau that will in any way infringe on the work of the States. On the contrary, in their case it will serve to stimulate and make more intelligent their work. It is as an aid to them and not as a supplanter that it will act. It will further their legislation, just as the activities of the Bureau of Education have furthered educational legislation in the States, and as the activities of the Bureau of Labor have furthered labor legislation in the States. The greater publicity that is given to lack of knowledge and lack of provision for children in various States will lead to the supplying of the wants. At the present time in the South Central division a child averages only 3.06 years of schooling. Is that period of schooling being increased or retarded by the fact that the Bureau of Education publishes it and all the world knows of the backward conditions there? Of course it is being increased.

The other objection urged by the minority is that there already exist governmental agencies for the gathering of the necessary information and that much of it is being gathered now. They make reference to the Bureau of Education. The functions of that bureau, according to its organic act, are:

To collect statistics and facts showing the conditions and progress of education in the several States and Territories and to diffuse such information respecting the organization and management of schools and school systems, and methods of teaching, as shall aid the people of the United States in the establishment and maintenance of efficient school systems, and otherwise promote the cause of education throughout the country.

And—

The commissioner is authorized to prepare and publish a bulletin of the Bureau of Education as to the condition of higher education, technical and industrial education, facts as to compulsory attendance in the schools, and such other educational topics in the several States of the Union and in foreign countries as may be deemed of value to the educational interests of the States.

There is nothing in those provisions which conflicts with the provisions of this bill, and that bureau does nothing in regard to infant mortality, birth rate, orphanage, juvenile delinquency and juvenile courts, desertion and illegitimacy, or poor housing conditions, and only touches on labor matters as they affect school children. The Bureau of Education is doing a splendid work. A moment's thought, however, will show that instead of the work for children being a subordinate part of the Bureau of Education, it would be far more logical to make the Bureau of Education a subordinate part of a children's bureau. Education is such a fundamental part of our American system, however, that it is highly desirable that it should have a separate bureau for itself.

Again, it is claimed that the Bureau of Labor is investigating all subjects connected with labor, and therefore covers those matters proposed for this bureau that relate to employment, dangerous occupations, and accidents and diseases of children of the working classes. In the law creating the Department—now the Bureau—of Labor it is provided that its "general design and duties" shall be—to acquire and diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with labor, in the most general and comprehensive senses of that word, and especially upon its relation to capital, the hours of labor, the earnings of laboring men and women, and the means of promoting their material, social, intellectual, and moral prosperity.

And—

The Commissioner of Labor is "specially charged to ascertain, at as early a date as possible, and whenever industrial changes shall make it essential, the cost of producing articles at the time dutiable in the United States, in leading countries where such articles are produced, by fully specified units of production and under a classification showing the different elements of cost or approximate cost of such articles of production, including the wages paid in such industries per day, week, month, or year, or by the piece; and hours employed per day; and the profits of the manufacturers and producers of such articles; and the comparative cost of living and the kind of living. And to ascertain and report as to the effect of the customs laws and the effect thereon of the state of the currency in the United States on the agricultural industry, especially as to its effect on mortgage indebtedness of farmers, and what articles are controlled by trusts or other combinations of capital, business operations, or labor, and what effect said trusts or other combinations of capital, business operations, or labor have on production and prices. He shall also establish a system of reports by which, at intervals of not less than two years, he can report the general condition, so far as production is concerned, of the leading industries of the country. The Commissioner of Labor is also specially charged to investigate the causes of and facts relating to all controversies and disputes between employers and employees as they may occur, and which may tend to interfere with the welfare of the people of the different States, and report thereon to Congress. The Commissioner of Labor shall also obtain such information upon the various subjects committed to him as he may deem desirable from different foreign nations, and what, if any, convict-made goods are imported into this country, and if so, from whence."

In the foregoing nothing is said of child labor. It is true that by special appropriation an investigation of child labor is being made by the bureau. But, as stated by the Commissioner of Labor, testifying before the committee, it would be twenty years again before he could give attention to the matter of child labor. He further testified that it would be much better to have a separate bureau to do this work, as in any investigation it might make it could inquire into every matter concerning children, whereas his investigation could only be partial and his bureau would have to ignore all causes of conditions other than the one of the effect of labor.

Many will query why the Bureau of the Census does not do this work. So far as statistics are concerned, it can do much of the work. That is the function of the Bureau of the Census, and it furnishes to both the Bureau of Labor and the Bureau of Education, and would furnish to this bureau, basic statistics. Statistics answer a few questions, but they raise a great many more. The Bureau of the Census, which makes only quantitative investigations, is not fitted to make qualitative investigations. This distinction was fought out in this House at the time that an appropriation was inserted in the sundry civil bill for the investigation by the Commissioner of Labor into the subject of the labor of women and children.

It is a very simple matter, however, to see how little the Census Bureau really aids to solve the questions which arise. The special report by the Census Bureau on "Prisoners and juvenile delinquents in institutions" for the year 1904 raises interesting questions, which the Census Bureau does not answer and the only answer to which could be obtained by intensive investigations. Take, for instance, the major offenders committed during 1904, of from 10 to 14 years of age. Why were there only 2 in the North Atlantic division out of a total for all ages of 8,639 in that division, and 74 in the South Atlantic division out of a total of only 3,744 for all ages in that division, and 106 for the South Central division out of a total of all ages of 4,973 for that division?

Why, on the other hand, of major offenders of from 15 to 19 years of age, were there 1,494 in the North Atlantic division, as against only 711 in the South Atlantic division and 1,009 in the South Central division? Why does somewhat the same relation hold true in regard to minor offenders, as to whom there were, between the ages of 10 and 14, in the North Atlantic division 87 out of a total of 67,596, and in the South Atlantic division 153 out of a total of 6,899, and in the South Central division 102 out of a total of 5,233, whereas among minor offenders from 15 to 19 years of age there were many more in the North Atlantic division than in the South Atlantic or in the South Central divisions? Various answers may suggest themselves. Intensive studies must be made, however, to obtain the correct answers.

The inadequacy of census figures to answer questions is again shown by the special report on cities having a population of over 30,000 in 1905. That report suggests a number of interesting queries under the table of arrests of children under 16 years of age. Why, out of a total of 1,412 arrests of children for all offenses, were there in Milwaukee 266 for drunkenness? Many will say that the answer is obvious and no investigation is needed. But why was the proportion still greater in Louisville, Ky., when out of a total of 1,405 arrests 310 were for drunkenness? Why were there so many in Memphis, Tenn., where out of a total for all offenses of 853, 183 were for drunkenness? And why, in Nashville, out of 2,489 arrests, were there 535 arrests for drunkenness? Why in Washington, out of a total of 1,746 arrests, were there only 3 for drunkenness, whereas in Duluth, out of a total of 253 arrests, 50 were for drunkenness?

Why, in South Bend, out of a total of 336 arrests, were 194 for drunkenness; in Malden, Mass., out of a total of 81 arrests, 36 for drunkenness; in Chattanooga, Tenn., out of a total of 1,150 arrests, 387 for drunkenness; and in Racine, Wis., out of a total of 150 arrests, 58 for drunkenness? Why, in Boston, were there 205 arrests for disturbing the peace and 499 for assault and battery; and in Milwaukee, on the other hand, 512 for disturbing the peace and only 117 for assault and battery? Why, in Cleveland, out of a total of 2,407 arrests, while there were only 10 for drunkenness, 111 for disturbing the peace, 59 for assault and battery, should there be 953 for larceny?

Take the question of first, second, and third offenses. Why, in New York, out of a total of 10,732 first offenders, were only 564 brought up on third and subsequent charges; whereas in Baltimore, out of a total of 1,834, 332 were subsequently brought up; and in Cleveland, out of a total of 1,182 first offenses, 357 were brought up a second time and 374 a third time or more?

The questions that suggest themselves are innumerable. They are brought up, not answered, by the census.

FAVORED BY THE CHIEFS OF OTHER BUREAUS.

Commissioner Brown, of the Bureau of Education, and Director North, of the Census Bureau, both approved the bill when before the committee. Commissioner Neill, of the Bureau of Labor, strongly urged its passage. For the convenience of the committee, I here give some extracts from their testimony to show the kind of work their bureaus are doing, to indicate that they are not fitted to do this work, and to give additional reasons why this bureau should be established:

EXTRACTS FROM STATEMENT OF MR. CHARLES P. NEILL, COMMISSIONER OF LABOR.

Mr. NEILL. Mr. Chairman, all I can say simply follows along the lines the Director of the Census has already suggested, that there is a very clear distinction, a clear line of demarcation, between two kinds of statistical work that does not always seem to be clear in the minds of some of those not engaged in such work. There are two kinds of statistical studies. One kind the Census Office only is equipped to handle. A bureau such as the one I have charge of could not handle those in any way at all. On the other hand, there are certain other kinds of work for which the organization of the census is not equipped, namely, intensive statistical studies. I might take just one illustration right here. Take, for instance, the question of infant mortality. We are at this time considering whether we will make a study in that particular topic. We have taken the records of the census and have gone over them very carefully; they have given us certain very valuable leads, but they do not explain what the specific causes are except in a large way. The question of causes requires an intensive study. We take certain cities we would select through the record that Mr. North gives us—without those records we would be entirely at sea—we would take cities showing certain rates and certain cities of a similar kind showing very different rates, and by a house-to-house investigation there determine to what extent those deaths might or might not be due, for instance, to the employment of the mothers of those children. That kind of investigation Mr. North's bureau is not equipped to make. Not only that, but the people that are going to prepare that report must themselves do the field work. That is, I could not sit in the bureau and take the statistics of any of the agents and prepare a report with any degree of intelligence. The persons who prepare the report must go out in the field and keep in touch with that work, or I have to have a thoroughly competent man or woman able to prepare and write that report, a well-trained, well-equipped man or woman, and let himself or herself actually direct the field work. That is, there is a certain background that they see the thing against in the field that nobody else outside of them can get. That work, as I say, could not have been undertaken. We simply would have been perfectly in the dark if it were not for the large and extensive investigation that the Bureau of the Census makes. I think that it is the same way here. After the census statistics are published and are available for this proposed bureau it would have to take those figures as guides and, taking the general leads that those things would give, make in smaller areas very intensive studies.

Mr. PARSONS. May I ask a question there?

Mr. NEILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. PARSONS. If you went into the subject of infant mortality, would you necessarily also report on how much infant mortality was due to bad living conditions—tenement-house conditions?

Mr. NEILL. No.

Mr. PARSONS. And heredity?

Mr. NEILL. No.

Mr. PARSONS. You would simply look at it from the one side of employment?

Mr. NEILL. Yes. As I say, if we went into that at all it would simply be studied in connection with the woman and child labor study to find out to what extent infant mortality is due to the occupations of mothers who are unable to take care of their children.

Mr. HARDY. In doing that, if you had to consider the number of deaths, in attributing some of them to the occupations of the mothers of the children, would you not also have to segregate those which were caused by tenement surroundings? To affirm one cause you would have to negative others, would you not?

Mr. NEILL. No; we would simply ignore those causes. That would take our attention away from the point of the inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Are any of the subjects enumerated in the proposed bill covered by the work of your department?

Mr. NEILL. Very few; and I might add that I have in my drawer a list of topics which we think it important to investigate, which we probably will not reach the end of for about a century or two. So there is no danger of objection to anyone invading the field of our bureau. We are quite willing to give up any part of the field to anybody else.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not so much the invading, but the avoiding of duplication.

Mr. NEILL. Infant mortality, for instance, only comes into our work in this present investigation. Take these subjects: "Accidents and diseases of children of the working classes," "Employment," "Legislation affecting children in the several States and Territories." But we have many other, and I think equally important, things to investigate; and we would be very glad, if there were such a bureau as this, to leave that field of study entirely to that bureau.

Mr. PARSONS. The legislation affecting children that you investigate would be——

Mr. NEILL. Only a small part of it; only affecting children at work. So I do not feel at all, Mr. Chairman, that any of this work is a duplication of what we are doing, and it would be handled in a different way. There are only one or two things that we would touch at all, and then we would handle them in a way entirely different.

The CHAIRMAN. Could not the same results be attained by creating another division?

Mr. NEILL. No; you can not get that kind of a man to go in as head of a division. I would not myself go in as head of a division in another bureau if I was paid twice the salary that I am paid; and I do not believe you could get the same quality of ability to do this work under the Bureau of Labor as you could if it was under an independent bureau. I think that is a point that should be considered in the concentration of government work; that is something that should be kept in view. The concentration, in my judgment, is certain to lead to a less high-grade quality of work.

The CHAIRMAN. You believe, then, the most practical thing and the most advisable thing is to establish a bureau?

Mr. NEILL. Unquestionably.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, as to gathering the statistics; you believe that that can not be done through the Census Bureau?

Mr. NEILL. They can unquestionably gather statistics of extreme value for this study, Mr. Chairman, which the bureau itself could not gather.

The CHAIRMAN. You believe, then, that the bureau might formulate these questions and the Census Office could gather the statistics for the bureau?

Mr. NEILL. It could gather on a large scale the statistics that are wanted; but after those statistics are gathered, it seems to me that in making the intensive studies they ought to be made by their own agents, just as we are doing now. I think Mr. North will agree with me on that; will you not, Mr. North?

Mr. NORTH. Entirely.

Mr. NEILL. I do not suppose Mr. North would argue for a moment that they should ask him for intensive information on a certain point and he send his agents out to get that.

Mr. NORTH. No.

EXTRACTS FROM STATEMENTS OF MR. S. N. D. NORTH, DIRECTOR OF THE CENSUS.

Mr. PARSONS. What has the Bureau of Labor to do with infant mortality?

Mr. NORTH. Nothing whatever.

Mr. PARSONS. Or the birth rate?

Mr. NORTH. Nothing whatever.

Mr. PARSONS. Or physical degeneracy of children? I can see that it would have certain relations.

Mr. NORTH. They are now looking more or less into that very question, I believe; are you not, Mr. Neill?

Mr. NEILL. Very incidentally, if at all.

Mr. PARSONS. What has the Bureau of Labor to do with orphanage?

Mr. NEILL. Nothing.

Mr. PARSONS. Or juvenile delinquency and juvenile courts?

Mr. NORTH. I do not see that they would have anything, particularly, at the present time.

Mr. PARSONS. Or physical degeneracy?

Mr. NEILL. Nothing.

Mr. PARSONS. Or dangerous occupations?

Mr. NORTH. Nothing.

Mr. PARSONS. "Accidents and diseases of the children of the working classes, desertion, and illegitimacy?"

Mr. NORTH. Nothing.

Mr. PARSONS. And "employment?"

Mr. NORTH. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Or "legislation affecting children in the several States and Territories?"

Mr. NORTH. No government bureau has any functions under that head. That is a new function which it is proposed to put upon that bureau, which I do not think has ever been assigned to any government bureau.

Mr. PARSONS. May I ask Mr. North a further question?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PARSONS. Suppose you have the statistics of infant mortality; do you make any study of the causes?

Mr. NORTH. Yes; we assign the cause of death in each instance, where known.

Mr. PARSONS. But do you classify as to how much, for instance, might be due to heredity or anything like that?

Mr. NORTH. No.

Mr. PARSONS. You make no intensive study?

Mr. NORTH. No, sir.

Mr. PARSONS. Your study is purely statistical?

Mr. NORTH. Yes; quantitative. We do not do intensive work in the Census Office.

Mr. PARSONS. Then, the relation between these matters and your bureau is the same as that between your statistical work in regard to labor and the intensive work in regard to the labor of women and children that Commissioner Neill's bureau has?

Mr. NORTH. Yes; the relationship is identical. That is what I have been trying to say. We could furnish in the Census Office a great deal of useful material for this bureau to work with as a starting point, and that would be perfectly easy, and that is the kind of work we are doing constantly. We are helping other bureaus by furnishing them with the foundation facts upon which they base their work.

EXTRACTS FROM STATEMENT OF DR. ELMER E. BROWN, COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION.

Doctor BROWN. I have had some conversation with the Secretary of the Interior with reference to this matter. We have not gone over it very much in detail, but he has expressed to me the belief that the subjects which are covered by this bill could be handled under the very broad terms on which the Bureau of Education is organized. Before going into any discussion of that question from my own point of view, I should like to say that I think there is danger that the purposes proposed in the bill will not be rated at their real importance. From the point of view of those of us who are engaged in educational work, these purposes are of the utmost importance, and it seems to us that if we are to make proper provision for the future industrial efficiency of this country, or its efficiency along all social lines, it will be necessary that such investigations as those that are contemplated in this bill should be undertaken with the utmost care. There is, then, on the part of those who are connected with the Bureau of Education and those with whom the Bureau of Education has most to do, a very strong sense of the importance of this measure. It certainly looks to the conservation of the character of our people in ways in which, I am convinced, we shall have to look to it with the utmost care within these coming years.

* * * * * * *

Mr. PARSONS. Would anybody wanting to know something about juvenile delinquency, for instance, write to Washington and ask the Bureau of Education about it?

Doctor BROWN. It is doubtful. I can not say whether that would be done or not; and we have at the present time no information available, no comprehensive information available, on such a question as that. The only way we can deal with such questions as that would be by considerable extension of our present work. I should say that even to deal with the subjects that should unquestionably be touched upon by the Bureau of Education without any extension of its present functions, it would be necessary for us to have experts that we are not now provided with.

In general terms, the matter appears to me about like this: That if this subject is to be dealt with according to its importance and in a comprehensive and concentrated way, that could best be done by the organization of a special bureau such as is proposed in this bill.

EFFECTIVE WORK OF OTHER FEDERAL BUREAUS.

No one would claim that the work done by the Census Bureau should be done by the States individually. The helpfulness of its work has been acknowledged by all and repeatedly by this House in extending its labors. Nor shall I touch upon the helpful work done for agriculture by the Department of Agriculture and the various bureaus of that department.

It will be more akin to the work to be done by this bureau to mention the work done by the Bureaus of Labor and Education.

The Bureau of Labor makes investigations of the wholesale and retail prices of articles of necessity, of wages and hours of labor, of the cost of living, of strikes and lockouts, of the cost of production and of the economic aspects of the liquor problem, and makes comparison between wages, cost of living, and retail prices in the United States and Europe. No state bureau could be expected to make as comprehensive investigations of such matters, and it would be a waste of public energy to have different States duplicating the whole or part of the work that a central bureau can best do.

Of the work of the Bureau of Education and its effectiveness, these statements were furnished to me by Commissioner Brown:

This office is laying the greatest stress upon the strengthening of the several state offices of education. It has held one conference of state superintendents of public instruction, and a second conference has been called for the near future. It has taken definite steps in the direction of a practical uniformity in state educational statistics and reports, which will render it possible to make much more reliable comparisons between different States than can now be made. It has also made arrangements for systematic distribution to the several state offices of the latest information concerning new legislative acts and administrative regulations in all of the States. The purpose of these new steps is to aid the state office of each of the States in becoming a more active and effective center for the educational life of the State. We have received abundant evidence of appreciation of these new arrangements.

The Bureau of Education has stimulated every State and city of the Union to make an annual survey and record of its educational provision. In 1867, when the office was created, few States made a complete record of their educational work; some none at all; there was no uniform plan for such data as were tabulated; hence those comparative studies which enable each community to participate in the experience and profit by the progress of every other were impossible. By its system of collecting, collating, and publishing educational information, the bureau presents a record of the progress and existing status of educational provision throughout the Nation unequaled for completeness and accuracy by any similar record in the world. It is cited as a model by the leading nations of Europe. Among the practical results in which this work has greatly aided may be mentioned the establishment of public schools throughout the country and the consequent decrease of illiteracy, which was a threatening evil at the time the bureau was established; the phenomenal increase in the number of high schools, especially in the South; the increase in the average annual school period; the very general increase in teachers' salaries; and the ever-increasing appropriations for school purposes.

But education is a continual process of adjustments to new social ideals and new industrial conditions. The bureau presents each year a record of efforts excited by new demands in the more progressive centers of the country, and thus supplies guidance and direction to other centers in advance of their demand, and to the saving of their energies and resources. Striking illustrations of this service on the part of the bureau are afforded by the spread of compulsory school laws and child-labor laws in this country, and by the ever-increasing attention to school hygiene, sanitation, and medical inspection, and by the increasing provision for physical training and for manual training as integral parts of school education. Information regarding these new lines of effort is in constant demand, and entails, besides the limited publications for which Congress provides, an enormous correspondence.

The new departures in education, as soon as they have passed the experimental stage, are embodied in legislation; hence, the periodical digests of school laws, which have become a feature of publications of this office, act as a stimulus for increasing the scope and raising the standard of popular education.

The influence which has been exercised by special publications of the office is strikingly illustrated by a special report on public libraries, which revolutionized library management and administration in this country, and has become a text-book of the library profession.

This office has also performed an important service in analyzing certain statistics collected from time to time by the United States Census and by the Labor Bureau, and so collating them with the educational statistics as to bring out their bearing upon the educational work of the country.

THE DEMAND FOR THE BUREAU.

People wishing to find out about children naturally look for a bureau or department bearing that name. It is not sufficient that there should be a division within a bureau of another name. The dignity of the subject is worthy of a bureau and worthy of having in it experts such as can only be got if the place is one of the dignity of a bureau. The legislatures, the institutions, and the people of the 46 States need such a bureau to go to for comprehensive information. There will come up questions that only such a bureau can properly investigate, and as to which it will not be fair to call upon individual States to make complete investigations.

The demand for the bureau is overwhelming among people who are concerned with the welfare of children.

The following were among the resolutions unanimously passed at the conference on dependent children recently called by President Roosevelt:

12. The care of dependent children is a subject about which nearly every session of the legislature of every State in the Union concerns itself; it is a work in which State and local authorities in many States are engaged, and in which private agencies are active in every State; important decisions are being made constantly by associations, institutions, and public authorities, affecting questions of policy, the type of buildings to be constructed, the establishment of an adequate system of investigating homes and visiting children placed in homes, and scores of important matters affecting the well-being of needy children. Each of these decisions should be made with full knowledge of the experience of other States and agencies, and of the trend of opinion among those most actively engaged in the care of children, and able to speak from wide experience and careful observation. One effective means of securing this result would be the establishment of a permanent organization to undertake, in this field, work comparable to that carried on by the National Playground Association, the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis, the National Child Labor Committee, and other similar organizations in their respective fields. It is our judgment that the establishment of such a permanent voluntary organization, under auspices which would insure a careful consideration of all points of view, broad-mindedness and tolerance, would be desirable and helpful, if reasonably assured of adequate financial support.

FEDERAL CHILDREN'S BUREAU.

13. A bill is pending in Congress for the establishment of a federal children's bureau to collect and disseminate information affecting the welfare of children. In our judgment the establishment of such a bureau is desirable, and we earnestly recommend the enactment of the pending measure.

The need of such a bureau to conscientious investors was forcibly put at the committee hearing by Mrs. Florence Kelley, general secretary of the National Consumers' League, who said:

Mrs. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I speak on behalf of the bureau both as a member of the national child labor committee and also on behalf of another organization which was already agitating for the creation of a bureau before this bill was actually drawn and before the child labor committee was actually created—the National Consumers' League—and I think I can perhaps illustrate one need of such a bureau by stating the experience of one member of the Consumers' League, a lady who, in Philadelphia, inherited a large block of gilt-edge stock in a southern cotton mill. She heard very ugly rumors of the conditions under which children were employed in the mill in which she thus became a very considerable owner. She was hindered from going and looking at her mill herself by lameness, which made it impossible, and she made inquiries. She asked the president of the corporation about the conditions in that State and he told her everything was all right, that she need have no doubt about it, that the President himself had sent a lady to investigate the conditions under which the work was being done, and before long we should have a report about it. So we have waited, but we have never had that report.

She got tired of waiting and wrote to the governor of the State and asked for a copy of the state census, thinking that she might learn something of the conditions under which children were at work from the state census, not having got very recent light from the federal census, which went back to 1900. The answer was that there was no state census in that State. She wrote then for a copy of the report of the state factory inspector, but the answer was that there was no state factory inspector. She wrote for a report of the bureau of labor statistics, but the answer was that there was no bureau of labor statistics. She wrote for report of the state bureau of education, but there was no such bureau of education. She exhausted the list of all the kinds of information which we get from some other Southern States and from all the Northern industrial States, and there was no information to be got. In the meantime the investigation by the Department of Commerce and Labor, under Commissioner Neill, had begun. That is now in its second year. She has had reports on the cotton crop which is used in her mill, always coming out promptly so as to be of use, but we have no bulletins of investigation of conditions of labor of women and children in that State, and from that source she has no information concerning her mill.

She finally became discouraged, did not wish to be a part employer in a corporation about which she could get no official information whatever, sold out her stock, and invested in tenement houses in New York, because about those you always know the worst [laughter]; you always know exactly where you are when you have tenement-house property in New York.

This is a highly intelligent and large investor, who is eager to invest money as her forbears have done before, in the same industry in which their investments have always been, if she can get the same kind of current, trustworthy information about that as about the crop that is used in the mill, or about hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of other investments.

We can not learn about many of our States; we can not get information about the conditions under which the children are working until that information has lost all its value. The organization of which I am a member compiles every year all the new child-labor legislation in a little handbook of child-labor legislation. We can not understand why it is left to us to do that, why there is no central body to which we can write here in Washington and get that information up to date and understandable. We have to go through a sort of process of predigesting it before any ordinary investor like that can understand it.

I forgot one item. The rumor came around very insistently, but always as a rumor, that there was a horrible thing in the State in which my friend's cotton mill stood, known as the "hook-worm disease;" that absolutely the only way the children could be cured of the hook-worm disease was by being exposed to tuberculosis by going to work in the cotton mills. If they stayed in the mountains where the air was pure, they fell victims to this disease with this ugly name, the meaning of which, indeed, we did not know. It was right puzzling to my friend, and she inquired in every direction about it, and finally she heard the rumor that the person who really knew about the hook-worm disease in the hill country of South Carolina was a physician in the Marine-Hospital Service.

Now, a northern investor is not likely to think just out of her own head that the only person who knows about the health of the children in the mountains of South Carolina is concealed in the Marine-Hospital Service [laughter], and that if you want to get that information you have to inquire and inquire and inquire until you accidentally come on this fact. We want to get away from such fumbling as that. If any stupid, illiterate farmer up near Catskill, in New York, wants to know something about raising artichokes on his farm, all he has to do is to get his son or the village schoolmaster to write to the Department of Agriculture, and he will be supplied with information not only about artichokes, but about everything relating to agriculture in the most compendious way, in every mail, much of it very valuable. But how different is the situation with regard to the children. We think we ought to be able in the same way to send a postal card, even, to a bureau here and at least get a clew how to go about our work. We will get some satisfaction out of the fact that we have a clew furnished us, as the Marine-Hospital Service was suggested as the place where that lady might get her information. [Applause.]

Mr. PAGE. In order to remove your impression about that disease, I may say that it is a disease of the sand country and not of a hill country.

Miss KELLEY. You see, even that we could not find out.

The general lack of information was instanced by Mr. Homer Folks, secretary of the State Charities Aid Association of New York.

Mr. FOLKS. I remember that there was a blank sent out at the time of the Paris Exposition on which certain institutions were asked to make an exhibit of their works. Up to that time we had estimates, and I think I can say without any fear of contradiction that there was a remarkable unanimity of opinion up to that time as to the outcome, that it was an extraordinary fact that 80 per cent of children cared for by every possible method turned out well. There was always a little exception, just a little, if it was closely analyzed, but so far as known it was estimated that 80 per cent was about the figure. That particular blank called for a careful inquiry as to how many of them were doing well up to 21 years of age. One particular institution, the Massachusetts State Reformatory, took it to heart, and the figures which they arrived at—I may say it was a very excellent institution—after making a careful inquiry of the facts, were such that they were not placed on exhibition.

Mr. HARDY. That was a reformatory for criminal children?

Mr. FOLKS. Oh, just juvenile delinquents.

Mr. HARDY. That would be very different from the general average, would it not? It certainly ought to be, at least.

Mr. FOLKS. Juvenile delinquency is one of the subjects included in the proposed inquiries of the bureau. As to the others, we have hardly enough data to make a read good guess. I have been engaged in that kind of work myself; I have been in close touch with that; it has been my special interest for fifteen years.

Mr. HARDY. I presume every State in the Union has an orphans' home?

Mr. FOLKS. I think that is probably true. There is some kind of an institution in the State, but not every State has one.

Mr. HARDY. There are States with no state orphan's home?

Mr. FOLKS. A great many of them.
Mr. HARDY. Then you have orders' homes also; Odd Fellows, Masons, or other orders have homes in nearly every State?
Mr. FOLKS. Every conceivable kind of home nearly.
Mr. HARDY. Do those institutions publish any statements?
Mr. FOLKS. They say how many people they had during the year and how many passed out of their care.
Mr. HARDY. Nothing of their training?
Mr. FOLKS. They tell you what they did while they were there, something about it, more or less—usually less. But what the effect was upon the children, what they were doing a year after they left there, what kind of citizens they become, they make no mention of.
Mr. HARDY. It seems to me your purpose is more to collect information about these matters.
Mr. FOLKS. That is just exactly our purpose.
Mr. HARDY. What is going to become of the magazine writers who tell us these things? [Laughter.]
Mr. FOLKS. Some of us are ready to take our information from a federal bureau. [Continued laughter.]

Mr. H. F. Fox, president of the Children's Protective Alliance of New Jersey, said:

Mr. Chairman, I happen to be the president of a state board in New Jersey which has to care for the dependent children, and for fifteen years have had some experience of various kinds in legislation that we have been trying to secure for children in the State. At every session, almost, we have had to meet the question of how to get certain kinds of information for the benefit of legislative committees or for the benefit of the governor or the departments in the State, and I am sorry to say that in a great many cases we have fallen down because the information has not been accessible.

I think it is proper to call attention to the amount of careless and ill-considered social legislation affecting children and others that is being enacted in a great many of our States. A great deal of this lax legislation could be wisely directed with the information which could be obtained through such a bureau as this. I think it was Uncle Zeke who said: "It ain't the ignorance in the world as much as it is knowing about so many things that ain't so." Only last week a noted temperance orator of this country informed the people that 80 per cent of the children who are working in the factories are children of drunken parents. If that is true, it is important that we should know it; and if it is not, it is equally important that we should know it.

Judge Lindsey, of the juvenile court of Denver, said:

I was in a certain city recently, and I went to the chief of police and asked him how many children had been in jail that year. He said 100. When we investigated the records we found there were 650 boys alone brought to the jail in that city of less than 150,000 people. I went into another city of less than 200,000 people, and when I asked the jailor how many boys had been in jail he said five or six hundred. When we investigated the records we found there were 4,000 arrests in that city among the boys alone under 20 years of age and over 2,000 brought to the jail who were under 17 years of age.

My friends, if we had a bureau of this kind it would stimulate the gathering of reliable statistics as it can not be stimulated or done in any other way. The head of a bureau of this kind would send to the head of a city a blank to be filled out and kept, and it is going to stimulate the official who is to fill out to keep records and return them to the Government. We have had some experience of this kind showing that this is done. Our state board sent out blanks to different judges, asking for information on this subject, and the information came in, but it does not come in any other way. There must be some kind of stimulus, if you please, to officials to get this information together, and it is going to come through a federal children's bureau, and in my judgment in no other way.

For instance, how many boys brought to jails in the cities of this country return within five years? In my own city, through private effort and investigation, we found 62 per cent of all the boys brought to jails returned in five years for worse offenses. In Chicago, under the commercial club, about ten years ago, a similar investigation was made, and they found that 75 per cent returned in five years. What effect does the work have in preventing crime? Another thing, 20 per cent of the boys in some cities of this country come to jails before they come of age. One out of every five mothers' sons comes to the jails in the cities of this country, according to some private investigations. Isn't that a fact, my friends, that this Government should know and be able to demonstrate?

Mr. Bernard Flexner, of Louisville, Ky., said:

Mr. FLEXNER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I will not consume more than a moment. I have nothing to add to the argument on behalf of this bill. I want to add a word as a representative of those in a State where private initiative has probably done a great deal less than has been done in other parts of the country. Practically all of the speakers who have preceded me represent parts of the country where private associations, private initiative, has been busy for many years gathering some of the information which it is proposed this bureau will get together—in a fragmentary way, it may be true. Now, we may have been slower in Kentucky in waking up to this problem. We have been. We are probably in the same situation that many other States are. We want to do the best that it is possible to do for the children. The only way, speaking from practical experience, in which it has been possible to get any spread of information upon many of the questions which are contemplated under this bill has been by an extensive correspondence which, in the main, had led to very unsatisfactory results. Therefore I take it that in a great many of the States there has been less sound public opinion than in others. I can probably make the point clear by an illustration of what took place in Kentucky a few years ago. A farmer accidentally turned up a mineral on his farm. He knew nothing about it. He sent on to Washington, and the Geological Survey sent down one, two, and three experts, who spent months in the remote part of the State investigating the find. An elaborate bulletin of 400 or 500 pages, profusely illustrated, appeared in due time, and hundreds of thousands of dollars was poured into the State of Kentucky in consequence of the work which the Federal Government did in the State of Kentucky on that particular farm. I am not here to underestimate the value of that. I merely want to say that while at one and the same time you are telling us how to open up our mines and to pursue the best methods with reference to the development of zinc and feldspar mines, let us be able to find out the best methods to care for the children.

I also add as an appendix to my speech the address of Miss Lillian D. Wald, head of the Nurses' Settlement on the east side of New York, which address was made to the delegates to the President's conference.

WHY NOT PROVIDE A CHILDREN'S BUREAU?

We have, among others, a Bureau of Pensions, a Bureau of Education, a Weather Bureau, a Bureau of Animal Industry, a Bureau of Plant Industry, a Bureau of Entomology, a Bureau of Soils, a Bureau of Chemistry, a Bureau of Biological Survey, a Bureau of Statistics, a Bureau of Corporations, a Bureau of Manufactures, a Bureau of Labor, a Bureau of the Census, a second Bureau of Statistics, a Bureau of Fisheries, a Bureau of Navigation, a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and a Bureau of Standards. And there are many separate offices that are in effect bureaus, though not so named. If we have a Bureau of Soils, why not a bureau of children? Why a Bureau of Biological Survey or a Bureau of Standards and not a bureau for children? And are fisheries more important than children?

What sort of investigations are other bureaus of the Government making? In the sundry civil bill, which we are considering, we are asked to vote $42,000 for continuing ethnological researches among the American Indians and the Indians of Hawaii. Why not make researches into the welfare of children? Is not the examination of children as important as the "examination of the geological structure and mineral resources of the national domain?" Is not the welfare of the children of the Nation as important as "gauging streams and determining the water supply?" As important as "chemical and physical researches relating to the geology of the United States?" As important as the "investigation of structural materials, such as stone, clay, and cement?" As important as the "cause of the decrease of food fishes?" And yet for all of these other purposes we are spending great sums, many times what is asked by a children's bureau. I do not decry these other expenditures. They are desirable. But $52,000 for a children's bureau is a still more desirable expenditure.

If over $300,000 is being spent for the eradication of scabies in sheep and another $126,000 for the eradication of scabies in cattle, why not spend a small portion of those amounts to save one-fourth of our blind from being blind, to make the deaf to hear, and to give to those charged with caring for the wards of the Nation the bureau of central information, the need of which they assert.

CONCLUSION.

Let me repeat what I stated at the outset, namely, that no appropriation of $52,000 would be more blessed in its effects, be the means of bringing more happiness to many, or accomplish more for the public welfare. It is said that—

The problem of the child is the problem of the race.

And again:

Give me the child and the State shall have the man.

In our country, made up of many States, we have found it important in various directions that there should be a central bureau with information for all. In no direction is it more important than in that of children. In ancient times there were cruel systems by which the survival of the fittest was established in brutal fashion, and only infants that could stand exposure were allowed to live. Such a practice now would horrify mankind. Our doctrine, on the contrary, is that if possible "not one of these little ones should perish." In the name of the thousands of infants who perish daily for lack of parental knowledge, of the thousands of children who need not have been born blind, of the thousands of children who, though deaf, could live as do those who hear, of the thousands of orphans, of juvenile delinquents, of the underfed, of the malformed, and of the children stultified by work, I ask that this bill be enacted into law, so that the American people, for reasons selfish as well as humane, can do their full part toward guarding the interests of the child.

APPENDIX.

A PLEA FOR THE CREATION OF THE CHILDREN'S BUREAU UNDER THE DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BY LILLIAN D. WALD, NEW YORK, MEMBER OF BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF NATIONAL CHILD LABOR COMMITTEE, HEAD WORKER HENRY STREET SETTLEMENT.

Although the national child labor committee stands sponsor for the bill introduced in Congress for the establishment in the Department of the Interior of a children's bureau, the committee can no longer claim sole guardianship of this measure, nor would it indeed desire to do so.

Two or three days ago 25,000 clergymen in these United States proclaimed once again from pulpits of all creeds the eternal message of the value of the child, outlined to their hearers the modern conception of childhood's claim upon society, and the obligations to the child of a society which has prospered by all the results of a progressive civilization. They asked their congregations, whether Jew or Gentile, to consider and support this effort to bring the child into his rightful share in the heritage of this civilization. And not only have the 25,000 clergymen and their congregations shown their desire to participate in furthering this bill, but organizations of many diverse kinds have assumed a degree of sponsorship that indicated indisputably how universal has been its call to enlightened mind and heart. The national organizations of women's clubs, the consumers' leagues throughout the country, college and school alumnæ associations, societies for the promotions of special interests of children, the various state child labor committees, representing in their membership and executive committees education, labor, law, medicine, and business, have officially given indorsement. The press, in literally every section of the country, has given the measure serious editorial discussion and approval. Not one dissenting voice has it been possible to discover; not one utterance contradicts the principles that have been laid down by these various representatives of humanitarian thought and unselfish patriotism throughout America.

It may be at first something of a shock to hear of taking the child out of the realm of poetry and pure sentiment into the field of scientific organized care and protection; but only to the superficially sentimental could it appear that the poetry and purity of childhood might be sacrificed by using all the fruits of modern thought, study, experience, and knowledge to their advantage. "Even the least of these." What would the bureau do? What measures for the advantage of the child, the future citizen, and the country would the bureau further? What innovations in governmental functions would the bureau introduce? These are pertinent questions that may well be asked, and which must be answered to the satisfaction of the men in both Houses of Congress before we shall have the right to ask them to vote for its creation. The bureau would be a clearing house, a source of information and reliable education on all matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life, and especially it would investigate and report upon the questions now nowhere answered in complete or unified form, and whose enormous importance to national life is so strikingly evident.

It would investigate legislation affecting children in the several States and Territories, and all other facts that have a bearing upon the health, the efficiency, the character, the happiness, and the training of children. Nothing would it do to duplicate any work now being done by state or Federal Government, but it would strengthen their work and bring into immediate usefulness all of the statistical facts that may lie in the treasure-house of any governmental department or any private association. Practical cooperation of this kind, based on intelligent sympathy, has already been assured by the far-seeing Chief of the Educational Bureau and by the head of the Census Bureau. As much of the results of their researches as would enrich the children's bureau would be laid before it almost without the asking, and yet, important as is their information and their knowledge, it covers only a part of what pertains to the whole great question of the wisest and most enlightened guardianship of our children—the most valuable natural asset of our Nation. Literally, the establishing of the Education Bureau is all that we have done that could be directly construed for the children, from which a construction might be made that we as a Nation are indifferent.

The children's bureau would not merely collect and classify information, but it would be prepared to furnish to every community in the land information that was needed, diffuse knowledge that had come through experts' study of facts valuable to the child and to the community. Many extraordinarily valuable methods have originated in America and have been seized by communities other than our own as valuable social discoveries. Other communities have had more or less haphazard legislation, and there is abundant evidence of the desire to have judicial construction to harmonize and comprehend them. As matters now are within the United States, many communities are retarded or hampered by the lack of just such information and knowledge which, if the bureau existed, could be readily available. Other communities within the United States have been placed in most advantageous positions as regards their children because of the accident of the presence of public-spirited individuals in their midst who have grasped the meaning of the Nation's true relation to the children and have been responsible for the creation of a public sentiment which makes high demands. But nowhere in the country does the Government, as such, provide information concerning vitally necessary measures for the children. Evils that are unknown or underestimated have the best chance for undisturbed existence and extension, and there, where light is most needed, there is still darkness. Ours is, for instance, the only great Nation which does not know how many children are born and how many die in each year within its borders; still less do we know how many die in infancy of preventable diseases; how many blind children might have seen light, for one-fourth of the totally blind need not have been so had the science that has proved this been made known in even the remotest sections of the country.

Registration and our statistics on these matters are but partial, and their usefulness is minimized by the unavoidable passage of time before their appearance. There could be no greater aid to the reduction of infant mortality than full and current vital statistics of children, such as no one community can obtain for itself, and for want of which young lives, born to be valuable to society, are wasted. We realize only occasionally, or after the occurrence of some tragedy, how little is known of other important incidents of the children's lives. We can not say how many are in the jails or almshouses, though periodically the country is stirred by some newspaper report such as that one of a little boy of 12 sentenced to five years in a federal penitentiary, or that of a little boy confined for some months upon a trivial charge and incarcerated with a murderer and other evil men and women in the cell of a county jail. Outside the few States which have juvenile courts there is chaos in the treatment and punishment of difficult children, and largely because of lack of knowledge concerning this important matter. This information can not be effectively obtained by private agencies. It is too vital to be left to that chance. Only the Federal Government can cover the whole field and tell us of the children with as much care as it tells of the trees or the fishes or the cotton crop.

I remember that some three years ago, when it was our pleasure to bring this suggestion before the President, his first expression of approval was, if I recall rightly, that it was "bully." It was a coincidence that the Secretary of Agriculture was departing that same morning to the South, to find out what danger to the community lurked in the appearance of the boll weevil. That brought home, with a very strong emphasis to the appeal, the fact that nothing that could have happened to the children would have called forth such official action on the part of the Government.

What measures for the advantage of the child and the country would the bureau further? No direct responsibility or administrative function for furthering new measures would be likely to fall upon the experts of a children's bureau, but, proceeding by the experience of other scientific bodies, there would be ample justification for employing the best minds of the country for the application of the knowledge gained, by using the stimulus of suggestion and education. It takes no stretch of the imagination to believe that, with the light of knowledge turned by responsible experts upon all phases of the problem of the child, the American people could be trusted if not with the immediate solution then with serious consideration, for what appears to be a national apathy is not really so in fact. What innovation in the governmental function would this introduce? This measure for the creation of a children's bureau can claim no startling originality. It would introduce no innovation—no new principle—in the functions of government. It is along the line of what we have been doing for many years to promote knowledge on other interests. On material matters, look carefully into the history of the development and present scope of the various bureaus within the authority of the Government; ample and fascinating analogies will be found.

Other countries, too, have awakened to realize the import of efficient guardianship of their children, have gathered expert information, and are using it under the leadership of trained specialists. The French call the development of this "child culture," which implies the use of scientific minds and trained powers, coordinated functions, and the protection of the state to the end of efficient manhood through a well-guarded childhood. Current literature every day shows the trend of civilized people to fix the responsibility upon the present generation to preserve and cultivate its resources, indeed charging as a crime against us any reckless waste of these. The English children's bill, already enacted, is the best example of this as regards the children. That bill is a most remarkable document indeed, covering practically every incident in the child's life that might come within the concern of the Government. Its 90 folio pages constitute a complete code and reflect not only the wide range of the Government's information, but cover every interesting phase of the development of this vital social and economic matter. A "veritable children's charter" it has been called. The forms of the English Government and ours differ. We do not desire the code; details and administration can be left to the States; but we do desire and we most urgently need information and the best means of broad publicity on all matters relating to the children that the national intelligence and conscience may be stirred. The full responsibility for the wise guardianship of these children lies upon us. We cherish belief in the children and hope, through them, for the future. But no longer can a civilized people be satisfied with the casual administration of that trust. I ask you to consider whether this call for the children's interests does not imply the call for our country's interests. Can we afford to take it? Can we afford not to take it? In the name of humanity, of social well-being, of the security of the Republic's future, let us bring the child into the sphere of our national care and solicitude.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID].

[Mr. KINKAID addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNDER THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Aiken, S. C., post-office: For completion of building under present limit, $35,000.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word. With reference to these public-building items, of which there are a large number in the bill, I should like to ask the gentleman whether these items on page 1, Aiken, S. C., and Albuquerque, N. Mex., are now in process of construction?

Mr. TAWNEY. They are not in process of construction, unless the purchase and acquisition of title to the site and the preparation of plans and specifications is the beginning of construction.

I will say with reference to all of these items of appropriation for public buildings that the committee have allowed the estimates submitted by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury where construction has been begun and is now in progress, or in cases where title has been acquired and plans and specifications are under way, and where the department will need the amount estimated in order to carry on the work during the fiscal year 1910.

In all cases where the department submitted an estimate for an appropriation, stating that the site has not yet been selected, or the title not acquired, we have disallowed all of those estimates. We are justified in that further because the Supervising Architect has informed us that in cases where sites were not selected prior to January 15, the date of submitting the revised estimates, it will be impossible for him to expend any part of the money during this fiscal year if it is appropriated. Therefore in making our recommendations we drew the line upon the estimates of the Supervising Architect between those cases where construction has been begun under previous authorization, where sites have been selected and plans and specifications are now under way and the money can be expended during the fiscal year 1910, and cases where no site has been selected and where the money could not be expended during the fiscal year 1910, if appropriated.

Mr. MANN. May I ask whether, in the case of the Aiken, S. C., post-office, there has been any more done than to acquire a site?

Mr. TAWNEY. The acquisition of a site is all that I know has been done. The title is perfect in the United States and the plans and specifications are under way; and that is true of all of these cases.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 9 and 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, strike out lines 9 and 10.

Mr. TAWNEY. Just one word in reply to the question of the gentleman from Illinois. I will read what the Supervising Architect says in submitting the estimate:

In regard to Aiken, S. C., the site has been selected and the title vested in the Government, and in order to complete the building there the balance will be required, in amount $35,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have no feeling against Aiken, S. C., nor against the federal building to be constructed there. It has been authorized by law. There is no more occasion for striking this out than there is for striking out the other one hundred or more cases in the bill. I shall test the sense of the committee on the question.

Here we are in a position where, in my opinion, before the 1st of July we will have a deficit for this fiscal year of over $150,000,000. Do we propose to go home into the different districts and say that we are issuing bonds for the purpose of putting up federal buildings without which the public business will be as well transacted as it is now? Is that to be the proposition that we will defend throughout the country?

When the public building bill came in authorizing the buildings the country was in a prosperous condition and there was every reason to believe that the Government might easily, out of the Treasury, pay the expense of this large number of public buildings throughout the United States. We had a fat Treasury, and it was well at that time to do that which the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds recommended and provide for the future construction of these buildings. But we are not in that condition now. Shall it be our policy to borrow money for the construction of buildings which, in the main, are merely monuments to the gentleman representing the district in Congress and not at all necessary for the operation of the business of the Government?

I have no doubt that Aiken, S. C., is a fine city, and has most estimable citizens, and an able Representative on the floor of the House; but, no doubt, the post-office business in Aiken, S. C., will progress just as well for the next few years if no public building is constructed there as it will if we borrow money for the purpose of constructing a building.

If this motion shall prevail, I shall offer a similar motion as to all the other items in this bill for the construction of public buildings where nothing further has been done than to acquire a site.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree with my friend from Illinois on this motion. It would be an unfortunate thing if this Congress should leave scattered throughout States of the Union vacant pieces of property owned by the Federal Government as monuments to the incapacity of the Republican party to conduct business properly. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. They would not object to it in South Carolina I am sure. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. We should much prefer that the Government should go in debt rather than to permit so many monuments to be scattered throughout the country to the incapacity during recent years of the Republican party.

In this particular instance Congress appropriated $15,000 and acquired a site in Aiken, S. C. I am not much of a judge of the value of property in that particular locality, but it does seem to me that there must have been acquired a very large tract of ground upon which to place this modest-priced building to cost $35,000. At all events, the site has been acquired. The department is ready to proceed, and I am anxious to have this building erected before the town grows to such an extent, as will be shown by the census to be taken in a few years, as to compel the Representatives from that State to insist that the limit of cost be largely increased, and the expense made much greater to the Government. While I am glad to welcome the gentleman from Illinois to the ranks of the patriots who have been attempting to stop the unjustifiable taking of money from the Federal Treasury, I fear that he has commenced at the wrong place.

Later on I shall invite his attention to some instances in which a great saving can be had without any detriment to the public business. I trust that he will reserve his efforts until we reach those places in the bill, and, with our aid, stop some of the liberal appropriations that are recommended.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I think I will find some that the gentleman may not like.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, it is not altogether unfortunate that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has made the motion he has and has made the remarks he has upon that motion. It affords an opportunity to call attention to the lateness of the hour in this session that the gentleman from Illinois and other gentlemen have deemed it necessary to commence preaching economy and calling attention to the danger to the Treasury of the United States in consequence of the anticipated deficit of $150,000,000 at the end of this fiscal year. This deficit was predicted a year ago when the Committee on Appropriations and others endeavored to keep down the expenditures without the aid of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAWNEY. It is also true that we have at this session of Congress——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am making discoveries. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] is a great discoverer.

Mr. TAWNEY. As I started to say, Mr. Chairman, it is also true that at this session of Congress we have increased the appropriations for the army and navy in the aggregate $23,000,000, or $5,000,000 more than is necessary to meet all the appropriations carried in the sundry civil bill for the construction and completion of public buildings, when sites have been selected under previous authorization, which appropriations amount to $18,000,000. It is also true that the gentleman from Illinois only a few days ago, when the army appropriation bill was under consideration, voted in favor of appropriating $500,000 for war balloons. He is perfectly willing to expend the public money, and even to borrow money, for the purpose of exploiting the air in time of peace, but is unwilling to expend any money for public buildings and necessary internal improvements because of the deficit in the Federal Treasury. In view of the fact that we are this year, out of every dollar of our revenue, exclusive of the postal revenues, expending 70 cents for war purposes and only 30 cents for all other governmental purposes, I think, Mr. Chairman, that if we have to borrow money to meet our extravagant war expenditures in time of peace, nobody should object to borrowing money to meet expenditures for internal improvements, improvements that are permanent in their character and are intended to meet the necessities of our Government in time of peace as well as in time of war. I do not believe that the gentleman seriously thinks that there is any prospect of his amendment prevailing. Nevertheless, it serves the purpose of calling attention to the fact that we are paying no attention whatever to the Public Treasury when considering war expenditures, but are admonished to practice economy when it comes to appropriating money for the peaceful objects of our Government. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to say a word in answer to the remarks made by my friend from Illinois. He says these public buildings that are appropriated for in this bill are not needed. From evidence submitted to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds at the last session, the members of that committee concluded that they were not only needed, but very much needed in the interests of the public business, and for that reason these authorizations were made. I do not think there is a single case provided for in this bill in which the public business will not be facilitated by the erection of the public building which is here authorized; and I for one, as a humble member of the Republican party, to which reference has been made, should very much dislike to have the impression go out to the country that we have ample money to build unnecessary battle ships, but not money to build necessary public buildings. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what sort of a system or rule was adopted in the appropriations made in this bill with respect to public buildings?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have once before explained to the House that the Committee on Appropriations accepted the estimates of the department made for the purpose of erecting buildings heretofore authorized, and have also accepted the estimates for the amount which, in the judgment of the department, can be expended in the construction of buildings during the next fiscal year. Where the site for the building was selected and the title is vested in the Government prior to the submission of the revised estimates on January 15, the estimate was accepted, and in all cases where sites were not selected at that time the estimates have been rejected; and in rejecting them we have done so upon information given to us by the Supervising Architect that if the appropriations were made the money could not be expended during the fiscal year 1910.

Mr. GARRETT. Unless the site had been purchased and the title vested before January 15 no appropriation has been made in the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Unless the site was selected prior to January 15 the Supervising Architect informs us that there was no necessity of appropriating money, because it could not be expended because of the vast amount of work the department now has. As I recall it, they have about 175 buildings in course of construction and for which plans are being prepared.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion, of course under existing law the drawing of plans is done under separate appropriations. Now, if the site has not yet been selected, the plans are not drawn, and after the title has been acquired by condemnation or otherwise, they then proceed to draw the plans to conform with the character of the site selected and money is appropriated here for the drawing of plans and all the preliminary work in the general appropriation separate from the distinct buildings.

Mr. FOSTER of Indiana. In this case where no sites are selected before the 15th of January, does the money heretofore appropriated for these buildings still remain available?

Mr. TAWNEY. The money heretofore appropriated in the cases where the site was not selected prior to the submission of the revised estimates will be available and remain available until expended, and in all cases appropriations have been made. This does not mean there will be no money remaining to go on with the preparation of plans and specifications or in the preparation of ground for the foundation or the erection of the buildings, as far as appropriation has been made. Under the previous authorization and appropriation the Supervising Architect can enter into a contract for the construction of all of these buildings, whether the site was acquired prior to January 15 or not. Therefore they can enter into a contract to go on and spend as much money as they have available during the next fiscal year.

Mr. GARRETT. If I understood the gentleman correctly, there are cases in which a site was selected before January 15 and purchase was not completed until after that time for which appropriations are made in this bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. My recollection is—I have no recollection of any cases of that kind.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Just one case.

Mr. TAWNEY. There may have been possibly one case.

Mr. GARRETT. What is that case?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is the case of Chelsea, Mass. Exception was made in Chelsea in the hope of helping it out in a disaster by means of this prompt appropriation, but that is the only exception.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman, in the post-office and public buildings bill of last session $5,000 was appropriated for a site at Springfield, Tenn., and the case is in this condition: I have been trying for months to get as prompt a report on it as I could and I find from information received from the Treasury Department that the Government has now abandoned getting it otherwise than by a friendly condemnation proceeding.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee there is no estimate submitted at all for that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am just trying to get at the exact legal status in reference to this money. Now, here is a case where we appropriated $5,000 for a site, and the district attorney at Nashville (Mr. Tillman) was directed to investigate the title, and he found a flaw in it, and he so reported to the department, and the department informs me that some time ago a friendly condemnation proceeding had been agreed on, and that proceeding is now proceeding. As I understand, in a case of that sort no money is carried in this bill to put up a suitable structure or additional money to pay for a site. That $5,000 has already been appropriated, but it seems the Government has been unable to get the title.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is the exact situation.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. But that will not cause any delay necessarily, because for the Supervising Architect to carry out the provision of the last public-buildings bill it will not be reached anyway before the next fiscal year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, another proposition. If the title had been all right and had been vested in the Government in time before this bill was passed and appropriation made for the superstructure, would the appropriation be carried in this bill in that case?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The appropriation would have been carried in this bill in that case.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to get clear in my mind now—it was clear in the mind of the gentleman from Minnesota, of course, if not exactly clear to me—there is no appropriation carried in this bill for any buildings except where the site has been selected and the title put in the Government prior to January 15 of this year, except, as I understand, in the case of Chelsea.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is the only exception.

Mr. GARRETT. That is the only exception?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope that my friend from Missouri, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, did not misunderstand what I said before, though I fear he misunderstood what I intended to say. I have no criticism of the authorization of the building at Aiken, S. C., or the other public buildings which have been authorized through his committee. I do not doubt that it is advisable to construct a public building at Aiken, S. C., and at the other places named. I have no hesitation in believing that it will be a fine thing for the business of the Government in the end; but I decidedly doubt the advisability of the Government, with an empty Treasury, attempting to construct public improvements of that kind when the business of the post-office at Aiken, S. C., will not suffer in the slightest degree if the public building there be delayed for several years longer, or at least until after we have passed a revenue measure which will bring into the Treasury as much income as there is outgo.

Now, my genial friend from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] hoped that I might have come sooner to his aid in saving the revenues of the Government. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that I advocated on the floor of this House an appropriation for a balloon; but if I had known of the hot air that the gentleman himself proposed to indulge in, I would not have favored a gas-manufacturing establishment with which to fill the balloon. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. I always yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the gentleman knew, when he voted for the $500,000 for a balloon, that $100,000 of it in the specifications were for a gas-bag garage, did he really think we needed that public building more than some of these other public buildings?

Mr. MANN. I certainly think we need it much more. We have no need at present, so far as the present needs are concerned, for many of the public buildings in this bill. The Government of the United States ought to make experiments with war balloons some day, and the gentlemen who are now quarreling over that will regret that they were the cause of defeating that appropriation, worth more many times over than all of the buildings provided for in this bill. But I wish to remind the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] that he is slightly derelict in his memory. He only recalls one instance in which I advocated an appropriation which he was opposing. I wonder if he did not think of the playgrounds, for which an appropriation of $15,000 was desired; and it is proposed now to appropriate millions of dollars which are not needed because I advocated $15,000 for the children. The gentleman's memory is getting poor and weak. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 61.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Baltimore, Md., post-office: Not to exceed $5,000 of the appropriation heretofore made for the extension of the post-office is made available for the installation of street railway tracks on the site of said building, including the necessary connections with the street railway tracks in adjacent streets.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, this is the birthday of George Washington—one of the greatest and grandest and most glorious characters in all history. With all lovers of liberty I appreciate his sterling character, his determination, his perseverance, and his self-sacrificing patriotism. There will never be but one Washington in America. He stands alone in the annals of our country—revered and respected and beloved by every friend of freedom. It was peculiarly appropriate that his Farewell Address should be read this morning in the House of Representatives. At the conclusion of the reading of that address I rose in my place and asked unanimous consent to have read an editorial from yesterday's New York American entitled "Washington's inspiration," and, I regret to say, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] objected. I know not who wrote this editorial, but it is one of the best I have ever read. It is timely and appropriate and one of the best short essays on George Washington that it has ever been my good fortune to read. It should be read by every ambitious and patriotic youth in the land. It ought to be preserved in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I now ask unanimous consent to have it read as part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON'S INSPIRATION.

Every American to-morrow will celebrate the birthday of George Washington. That is a birthday that will never be forgotten while liberty, or even the hope of liberty, shall exist in this country.

Among the great men of this Nation and of the world Washington stands out as the representative of courage, fixed purpose, that no defeat or disappointment could destroy.

Washington stands as the quiet, brave man among the world's great heroes.

Thanks to the public schools, there are few men, women, or children in this country that lack a fairly comprehensive idea of Washington. We see in him the big, mental and physically powerful upholder of liberty and of justifiable revolution.

We are encouraged in every one of our struggles of government by the memory that Washington was, above everything else, a rebel. He was no man bowing the neck meekly before injustice, prostituting the name of law. He looked at acts, at conditions of life, at the will of the people. You could not blind him with talk of law, or established rights, or tradition, or precedent.

He had been a soldier under the command of England. But that did not keep him from leading the rebellion against England when he knew that she was wrong and that America was right.

He was a rich man, and died one of the richest men in this country. That did not prevent his sympathizing with those that were not rich. It did not prevent his siding against the horde of cowardly rich that cluttered up New York's island and that protested against everything done in the name of liberty or ran away to Europe.

Washington was the great, strong rebel against injustice. He was slow to make up his mind; his name does not figure among the fiery orators that asked for liberty or death. But when everything was done, the name of George Washington stood out as that of a man who had carried the load, fought the fights, endured disappointment, ingratitude, the cowardice of enlisted troops, and all the other burdens of a man who tries to work for the people.

The whole world recognizes the grandeur of Washington's character. The people of America should celebrate his birthday not merely with praise of him or study of his character. The best way to celebrate the birthday of Washington is to make ourselves better Americans, more worthy of this country that he took from England, more determined to resist taxation without representation, as he resisted it, whether that taxation be put on our backs by the English in 1776 or by the money king of 1909.

We can't be worthy of Washington by admiring Washington or thinking about him or praising him. To deserve such a man as that, men of the Nation should try to be like him.

We can't all be physical giants, as he was. We can't create artificially within ourselves the wonderful, patient, plodding courage, the unbelievable persistence that that man showed in his long, uphill fight.

But every man, the weakest even, can, if he will, imitate Washington in one respect. The least of us can take for guiding star one idea, one inspiring purpose or belief, and stick to that.

This picture ingeniously presents the flag of this country in the form of a blazing torch lighting up Washington's hour of disappointment and sorrow.

You know that Washington wasn't a man of victories, but a man of many defeats. He had raw and unreliable troops. And these troops didn't by any means consist exclusively of heroes. He was forever retreating, forever enduring disappointment, and the most frequent disappointment was the sight of the coat tails of vanishing soldiers that had enough of fighting and left Washington to fight it out alone.

He did fight it out. Always before him there were the light and the hope of a free nation. He was determined to make this country free.

He was determined to beat the English and to drive them out. He was determined that the people of America should rule in America, and should not submit to a foreign king or a foreign people or a foreign parliament.

He never dropped that thought for one moment, and therefore they could not beat him. He did last, he did fight, he did drive out the English, and he made this people free, free to rule themselves within their own borders.

That is the George Washington that Americans of to-day should think about, the man determined that the people should rule themselves.

We need a George Washington now.

We need great leaders, plain citizens imbued with the one idea of liberty, real liberty, real freedom, not the second-rate, sham freedom that casts an unthinking ballot and accepts dictation and taxation from the cunning money rulers by whom the ballot was written and the candidates nominated.

We haven't any intention of basing upon Washington's birthday any special political sermon. We don't wish to imitate the well-meaning person who got up at the funeral and said that if nobody objected he would like to say a few words about the single tax.

We are not going to use a birthday or a funeral for any special theorizing.

We do say to the men who read this paper that they and this country need persistent principle. They need some of that courage that isn't beaten down by one defeat, or ten, or twenty.

America needs men to whom the idea is the thing, and victory or defeat a secondary matter.

This one inspiring idea we need, not only in our political life, which has degenerated into a mere imitation of freedom and democratic government, but in our individual lives as well.

Half of the men and women in the world, and more than half, are like boats drifting on the water without a rudder, or a compass, or a chart, or a destination. With the pangs of birth they are launched upon the sea of life, and they drift. One current drives them this way, another that way, and then a breeze of public opinion or neighborhood gossip springs up and drives them somewhere else. They drift here and there and back again, and at the end they drift into the local graveyard, having gone nowhere and done nothing.

It is all for lack of a purpose, an inspiration.

What is there that you can do? What is there that you want to do? What work within your power is worthy of an earnest human being? Make up your mind about that, and then stick to it, as Washington stuck to his idea of American independence.

Pick out some one thing, plan out for yourselves some one direction. Start in the right way and steer straight, and keep at it. There's very little competition in the world. And of real determination there's less than of any other quality.

Washington won because he was a determined man. There were no Washingtons competing with him, and yet absolute determination might have made a Washington out of any one of a dozen of those that he tired out and defeated in the end.

We can't have marvelous genius and intelligence. Those things are born in a man. But Washington did not have them. He hadn't the eloquence of Patrick Henry. He hadn't the political genius of Jefferson, or the wit or intellect of Franklin. Around him there were men that could eclipse him in everything except dogged determination. There they couldn't beat him. And that quality in George Washington beat England and freed this country.

Don't you suppose that the quality that drove the English out of America and established this Nation could settle your little problems for you? Try it and see.

Look at this picture of Washington—a crude enough picture in our quick-printing processes, but a splendidly ideal picture.

Get into your life an idea that shall light up the blackest moment, let yourself be guided by an inspiring thought and purpose. It will make defeat often repeated more glorious than some cheap victory.

Think over Washington to-day, and on his birthday to-morrow, and see if you can't get out of his life a part of that one quality which made it great, and put it into your own life.

Determination will make any man succeed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Beaumont, Tex., public building: Not to exceed $800 of the appropriation heretofore made for the public building at Beaumont, Tex., is made available to acquire, by condemnation or otherwise, additional land for enlargement of site for said building.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I notice there are several items in this bill which are also contained in a public-building bill which was passed here last Friday. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, more for advice than anything else, as to whether it would be well to provide for these necessities in two bills, or whether these items might be stricken out of this bill and left in the other? I want to be entirely frank in this matter. There is a possibility of the public-building bill which passed last Friday failing for the reason that I understand an effort may be made in the other House to load it down with appropriations. We in this House have pursued a policy in this session of not allowing any new appropriations; hence, if the other House insist on making them for the Senators, I, as a member of the conference, would be justified in insisting that they be also made for Members of this House, or that the whole bill fail. So with this situation I would like to hear the chairman of the committee.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would say that I have no objection whatever to the several provisions referred to by the gentleman from Missouri going out of this bill. But I would suggest to him that none of them involve any additional appropriations. They are merely a transfer of part of the appropriation made for the building to the purchase of additional land for sites. But the better plan, the safest plan, in view of the fact that these changes are absolutely necessary, would be to let them pass the House in this bill; then if there is a likelihood of the public-buildings bill passing, so that they would be in both bills, the bill could be amended in the Senate and these provisions stricken out. If the public-buildings bill fails, then this bill would be in conference, and we could put them back in.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to these items being retained in this bill.

Mr. DAWSON. But the gentleman from Missouri says they carry appropriations as well as transfers.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. No appropriation.

Mr. DAWSON. It would hardly be the same legislation as this.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Exactly the same legislation.

Mr. TAWNEY. The items that he refers to carry no appropriation at all. They are transfers of an appropriation previously made.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds what proposition, if any, is made in this bill or any other for those buildings that were provided for in the last general public buildings bill of last Congress?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. As has been explained a little while ago, Mr. Chairman, in all cases where the sites have been purchased and title vested in the Government before January 15, the Committee on Appropriations has inserted an appropriation for that respective building. Where the title has not been vested in the Government up to January 15, no provision is made in this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What provision is made, if any, for buildings provided for other than appropriations made providing for the plans of the buildings?

Mr. TAWNEY. All of them. An appropriation is carried in this bill for that purpose.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The gentleman is mistaken about those buildings in which the titles have not been vested in the Government. If he will consult the letter of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury printed in the hearings, he will find the statement is not borne out by the facts. The committee has reported appropriations for buildings where the title to the property has not been vested in the Government.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is one.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. There is more than one.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There are more cases than that. The sites have been selected in every case where the transfer of the appropriation has been made except Chelsea.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Up to what time?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Up to the 15th of January, the time the report was made, there was absolutely no exception except Chelsea, and in every case where it had been requested it had been refused; the only case excepted was that of Chelsea in the hope that it might help them on account of the fire there.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Where the site had not been vested; there are a number of places where the Supervising Architect reported that the title had not vested in the Government, and yet they are provided for.

Mr. TAWNEY. But there is no objection to that, I hope.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I was not objecting; I was speaking of some being put in and of some being left out.

Mr. GARRETT. If this is a matter of selection by system it is all right; if by cancellation it is not.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. There is absolutely only one exception in the United States, and that is the town of Chelsea.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I think they did right about that.

Mr. GARRETT. I think so, too.

The Clerk read as follows:

Beloit, Wis., post-office: For completion of building under present limit, $55,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question. I notice on page 16 of the hearings a statement of buildings appropriated for, but not in course of construction. Beloit, Wis., is omitted, but Beloit, Kans., is in that list. Over on page 38, however, I see provision for Beloit, Wis.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. It is in the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I know it is in the bill; but I did not want, at any other place or time, any statement made that it did not come from the Treasury Department.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will look at page 38 of the hearings, containing the revised estimate, and a part of the report from which he was reading, he will observe that the memorandum accompanying the estimate for Beloit, Wis., is this:

The site has been selected and the title vested in the Government, and in order to complete the building thereon the balance will be required, in amount $55,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I was relying upon this table on page 16.

Mr. TAWNEY. Construction has not yet begun in the case of Beloit, Wis.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cleveland, Ohio, rent of buildings: For rent of temporary quarters for the accommodation of government officials, $51,428.20, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. I notice here an appropriation of $51,000 for rent of buildings in Cleveland. Is that for one year, or for what length of time?

Mr. TAWNEY. That is for the fiscal year 1910, or for the year beginning July 1, 1909. That is for the rent of buildings to accommodate the post-office necessities of the city of Cleveland.

Mr. SABATH. It does not so state. The bill states:

For rent of temporary quarters for the accommodation of government officials.

It does not say it is for a post-office. Is it for a post-office?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. And for all the other federal offices?

Mr. TAWNEY. All that will be accommodated in the federal building when it is completed.

Mr. SABATH. Can the gentleman state about how many years it will take to complete that building?

Mr. TAWNEY. I refer the gentleman to the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department for an answer. I can not state.

Mr. MANN. This bill provides for the completion of the building.

Mr. SABATH. But it does not say when it will be completed. I know we had an experience in Chicago, where we were obliged to pay rent for about ten or twelve years.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman must remember that all western cities are not like Chicago.

Mr. SABATH. I know, but the city of Chicago was not responsible for the delay. It was the department.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman must remember that Chicago has been much more rapid about getting public buildings completed than New York City has.

Mr. SABATH. Chicago needs the public buildings more than New York, because it is increasing in population much faster than New York.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman that the amount carried in this bill, $51,428.20, for rent of temporary quarters for the accomodation of government officials, is the same amount that has been appropriated every year since 1907. Prior to that the amount was in excess of that figure. For 1906 it was $54,000.

Mr. SABATH. What I am anxious to know is, how long will that continue?

Mr. TAWNEY. The limit of cost is $3,775,000. The appropriations up to date amount to $2,750,000, and the estimate for this year is $1,025,000. It is supposed to be completed within the next fiscal year.

Mr. SABATH. Let us hope so.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I trust the information is satisfactory to the gentleman. The contract has recently been let for the completion of the interior finish, and that will complete the building. There has been a good deal of delay in the building, for which the community has not been responsible.

Mr. SABATH. Who is responsible for these delays in building public buildings?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I do not know that anybody is. That is too complicated a question for me to answer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Crookston, Minn., post-office: For site and completion of building under present limit, $20,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, to correct a misprint.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, line 14, strike out the word "twenty" and insert the word "twenty-five."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Eugene, Oreg., post-office: For site and completion of building under present limit, $20,000.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 19, page 13, insert:
"Everett, Wash., for site and completion of building under present limit, $30,000."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I trust the chairman of the committee will accept this amendment, as this item was left out by mistake. The site has been selected and the appropriation has been made for the construction of the building, and under the rule laid down by the committee they ought to accept the amendment. It arose through a mistake made by the department.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How did the mistake occur?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I presume the department became confused between two post-offices; in one they reported that a site had been purchased when it had not, and the other that it had not been purchased when it had.

Mr. TAWNEY. The facts were these: The department reported to Congress that no site had been selected for the office at Everett. They reported that a site had been selected for Walla Walla, Wash. It now appears the site has been selected for Everett and no site has been selected at Walla Walla.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has the title to the site been vested in the Government at Everett?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; but it has been selected and the contract closed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It has been "selected" in my case since last December, but as yet no title has been vested in the Government. The chairman of the committee has stated that where the title had not been vested in the Government no appropriation was carried in the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, no; the gentleman misunderstood me. In the case that the gentleman from Tennessee alludes to the department made no estimate whatever, because the controversy as to condemnation proceedings were pending in the matter, and they made no estimate at all.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Of course the committee would have no jurisdiction or right to insert any appropriation here for a public building not authorized and where there had been no estimate submitted.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The government officials have been trying to get title and have not been able to get it and have had to resort to condemnation proceedings, which are now pending, as stated. I simply wanted to know if the case of the gentleman from Washington was in any way like mine. It seems that it is not, but I hope that he will get the appropriation if he is due it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is not like mine. In this case the department has selected a site and has obligated itself to take it, and there is no controversy about it.

Mr. TAWNEY. When was the site selected?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The appropriation for Walla Walla will have to be stricken out, then.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; if that is the fact.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The error has probably arisen in confusing these two offices.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There is no doubt in the world but that the Government is going to take the lot selected in my case; but the title is not in the Government, and that is the case of the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. There is no trouble about the selection of the site in my case.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Washington can inform the committee as to whether the site has been selected at Everett and not Walla Walla, I have no objection to making the change by striking out Walla Walla and carrying Everett, but I have no information from the department.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not want to consent to the striking out of Walla Walla.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the circumstances are as stated by the gentleman from Washington, Walla Walla will go out if Everett goes in, because we have undertaken to carry out the policy of appropriating where the site has been selected prior to the time the revised estimate was submitted; and we do not intend to carry any appropriation for construction of a building where a site has not been selected, for the reason that the department says that they can not spend the money if we make the appropriations, and it seems ridiculous to make an appropriation for the construction of a building where the appropriation can not be expended in the next fiscal year.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. Just sets aside that much of the current revenue of the next fiscal year that can be of no service until the following fiscal year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What does the gentleman mean by the term "when the site has been selected?"

Mr. TAWNEY. I mean the site has been selected and that fact reported to the committee. We have in every case, with the exception of the case mentioned by my colleague, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], Chelsea, Mass., allowed the appropriation estimated; but where the site has not been selected, or was not selected at the time this report was submitted to us, no appropriation has been carried, for the reason that the money can not be expended.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is the site supposed to be selected simply when the department has picked out a lot, but the title has not been passed?

Mr. TAWNEY. If the site has been selected by the Government, it has been accepted, although deeds of conveyance may not have passed between the owner and the Government.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My understanding is that until title has been vested in the Government the department does not consider the lot has been "selected." Of course I suppose that is because the title may fail and the Government may not be able to get it unless it condemns and takes it, and I think that is my case.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. This amendment comes squarely within the rule laid down by the committee, and it was for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to this mistake that I offered the amendment. Therefore I ask for a vote.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, before the vote is taken I would like to ask the gentleman what information he has as to the selection of the site for Everett, whether the department has advised him the site has been selected, and when?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They have. I was in communication with Mr. Beekman Winthrop, who has charge of this matter in the Treasury Department, and he informed me that the site has been selected, and I advised him then to call up the Committee on Appropriations, and he did have some conversation, I think, with that committee. There is no question about the facts in the case.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman that I am informed that the gentleman to whom he refers, and who communicated with the Committee on Appropriations, did not even know that this letter of January 15 had been sent to the committee.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think that is true. He did not know it.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would suggest to the gentleman from Washington that he allow this provision and amendment to pass over without prejudice until I can ascertain from the Supervising Architect what the facts are.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman read that letter from the department?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is printed in the hearings.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If I can have the attention of the gentleman a minute, I will state I have no objection to that being done. As far as the attention of the gentleman to whom I referred not having been called to that letter, I am not surprised he did not know about it, because if he had known, it probably would not have contained the errors that are in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that his amendment may be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Marlboro, Mass., post-office: For continuation of building under present limit, $40,000.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Following the paragraph that has just been read should appear, Maryville, Mo. In the last session a building was authorized there and $50,000 appropriated. As I understand the statement of the chairman of the committee, no additional appropriations are to be made this year unless the site had been selected before the 15th of January. Now, I understand the site was selected there before that time, but the title was not vested in the Government; and if by selecting the site is meant vesting the title, why, of course the title had not vested before the 15th of January.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Treasury Department reports to the committee the site has not been selected for the Maryville post-office, Maryville, Mo.

Mr. BOOHER. On the 15th of January?

Mr. TAWNEY. That is in the report dated January 15.

Mr. BOOHER. I was notified by the department during the holidays that the site had been selected and where it was selected, but the deeds had not passed.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that on Saturday of last week the Supervising Architect, after this bill was reported, authorized me to say to any Member of the House who was interested in the appropriations for buildings in his district, that in no case, even if the full amount up to the limit of cost was appropriated where the sites for buildings had not been selected and approved by January 15, could a dollar of the money be expended during the next fiscal year; that the amount of work they had on hand would be all and more than they could perform.

Mr. BOOHER. Then nothing would be accomplished by making an appropriation for that building at this time?

Mr. TAWNEY. Nothing whatever, except that the amount would be set aside out of current revenues to meet this appropriation to be expended in the year 1911.

Mr. BOOHER. And nothing will be lost?

Mr. TAWNEY. Nothing will be lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

Milford, Mass., post-office: For site and completion of building under present limit, $55,000.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 24, after line 11, add:

"Milledgeville, Ga., post-office: For completion of building under present limit, $30,000."

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I find in the hearings before the committee a letter from the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, dated January 8, in which the statement is made that "the site for this building had not yet been selected, but that one would probably be selected in the near future, and that in order to complete the building it would be necessary that the balance be appropriated in the amount, $30,000." Since that time, a very few days after the 8th of January, this site was selected and was approved; in fact, the agent of the Government had reported upon the site that has been selected. The titles have been made, and I do not know why they have not been approved. There is no trouble about the title, and the only question now why it has not been approved is the Attorney-General has not completed the approval of the titles. In other words, the proposition to build this building at Milledgeville occupies the same position as Waycross, Ga., and one or two other towns that are mentioned in this bill, where the Government has selected a site but the title has not vested in the Government.

The Government in this case has already gotten the titles, the titles have been made, and the only question is whether the Attorney-General will approve them. Now, in my opinion, I believe this amount ought to be appropriated. First, there was $50,000 appropriated in the public-buildings bill. Of that $20,000 has been appropriated and made available. The site has cost $10,000, and now as early as the 8th of January the Supervising Architect recommended that the other $30,000 be appropriated. The site has been selected and approved, all the titles have been made to the Government and this occupies a position where the amount asked for ought to be appropriated. I hope it will be, as there is no reason why it should not be.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry indeed to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, but I want to say to the committee that the total estimates for public buildings submitted to Congress aggregate, in round numbers, $23,000,000. Now, the amount recommended by the committee is $18,000,000, in round numbers. To ascertain whether or not any reduction of the estimates could be made, the committee necessarily inquired into the question of whether, if the amount estimated for was all appropriated, that amount could be expended during the next fiscal year, and we ascertained that in those cases where sites had not been selected prior to the time of submitting this report that if we made the appropriation the money could not be expended, and therefore the committee concluded not to appropriate money that could not be expended.

By adopting that policy we reduced the estimates $5,000,000. Now, if this amendment is adopted then we may as well go back and take in all the other buildings in which Members of the House are interested——

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman permit——

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing). For which appropriations have heretofore been made and which have been authorized by law. In that event we will appropriate $5,000,000 that can not be expended during the fiscal year 1910.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman, there are not a great many that occupy the same position that this case does. That site has been selected, and the approval was not made because I happened to be on a visit to Panama on official business, and——

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not answer that.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I can, and the gentleman ought to take my word for it, certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would accept the gentleman's word for anything. I accept the word of the gentleman on anything or on any subject, but, Mr. Chairman, we have to discriminate somewhere; we must distinguish between the appropriations for previous authorizations, and the discriminations made here are in those cases where the money can be expended and where the money can not be expended. Now, I want to say a word, if the gentleman will permit me, that, in my judgment, there are about $8,000,000 recommended in this bill for public buildings that will not be expended during the fiscal year 1910. In fact the Secretary of the Treasury recommended to Congress an appropriation of a lump sum of $10,000,000, which would be all that, in his judgment, could be expended on previous authorization. This would have allowed him to spend it wherever he saw fit——

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman from Minnesota permit me to interrupt him——

Mr. TAWNEY. In just a moment. (Continuing.) But the committee did not feel justified in departing from the established rule and custom of the House, which is to specifically appropriate for the various buildings under existing authorizations, so that every Member would know the amount made available for carrying on the construction of the building in which he was particularly interested. Had we followed the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, no Member would have known whether his building or the building authorized in his congressional district would be advanced in construction during the next fiscal year or not, so we have recommended all they can possibly expend, and, in my judgment, have given them more than can be expended.

If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] will point out to me that the appropriation which he now has of $20,000 will not be sufficient to enable the department to do all that can be done on his building during the next fiscal year, I will not object to increasing the amount; but in view of the fact that the site, if it has been selected at all, has been selected only recently—and I do not doubt but that it has been selected—the title has not yet passed, plans and specifications are not yet prepared, and they have $20,000 now available for the purpose of beginning work, and the contract for the entire building can be let under the existing authorization and the existing appropriation. Therefore $20,000 being all that can be expended during the next fiscal year, and that amount being now available, I do not see any good reason why an exception should be made in this particular case.

I now yield to the gentleman's colleague [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Surely the gentleman will permit me right here to ask him a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to my colleague from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. TAWNEY. I first promised to yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope the time will be extended five minutes in order to answer our questions.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I wanted to say to the gentleman that the reason I can not give him the exact date of the approval and selection of the site is that this is a holiday, and there is no access to the records of the Treasury Department to-day, or I would have undertaken to do it. If the gentleman will permit this amendment to go over——

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] think that the work on his building or site is going to be delayed by reason of not securing money which the department says can not be expended during the next fiscal year?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Supervising Architect says that if he had this money he could not expend it?

Mr. TAWNEY. The Supervising Architect informed the committee, and authorized me to state to the Members of the House, that the money could not be expended in cases where sites had not been selected prior to the time this report was submitted.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. That is not this case.

Mr. TAWNEY. He has so reported.

Mr. ADAMSON. I merely wanted to understand, Mr. Chairman, the information that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] has on this question. I am in the same boat exactly with my colleague in this matter. I had a site purchased at Lagrange, Ga., for $8,000, with appropriation available of $20,000, and I want to know if the gentleman has any information that more money than the remaining $12,000 can not be expended during the next fiscal year, or if the building will not be delayed by reason of lack of funds?

Mr. TAWNEY. I have the statement of the Supervising Architect, in charge of this public construction——

Mr. ADAMSON (continuing). Because if it is necessary——

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing). And the Supervising Architect gave in detail the number of buildings now in the course of construction, and where the plans and specifications are prepared, or nearly prepared, so that the contract for the construction can be let; and he says it is impossible for him to do any more with any amount.

Mr. ADAMSON. If it were possible to accelerate the building by making the increased appropriation now, I think it ought to be made now.

Mr. TAWNEY. So do I, and they would have so recommended if that were so.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to say, for the information of the committee, that the Supervising Architect has just about completed the plans for the buildings that were authorized in 1906, and those of us who had public buildings provided for in the act of 1908 will not likely find our plans perfected and the department ready to proceed with the construction of our buildings during the next fiscal year, unless some provision is made for an additional force in the Supervising Architect's Office to make these plans.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Newark, Ohio, post-office: For site and continuation of building under present limit, $15,000.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill a question in reference to this item. By a former act $90,000 was authorized for the purpose of acquiring a site and erecting a public building at Newark, Ohio. The site was accepted, acquired, and paid for some time last summer. Eighteen thousand dollars, I believe, was the consideration for the site, which would leave $72,000 for the building. I would like to inquire of the chairman of this committee why only $15,000 was made available, when I understand the contract is to be let this spring for the building?

Mr. TAWNEY. I would say to the gentleman that the item of appropriation is on a building the limit of cost of which was $90,000.

Mr. ASHBROOK. That is right.

Mr. TAWNEY. There has been appropriated $60,000 already.

Mr. ASHBROOK. You say has already been made?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, sir; already made. Now, the Supervising Architect in submitting his estimates said:

The site has been selected and the title vested in the Government, and in order to continue the building there will be required of the balance $15,000.

There is a balance of $30,000, and we have given all that can be expended on the building in continuing the building for the fiscal year 1910.

Mr. ASHBROOK. That is satisfactory.

The Clerk read as follows:

New York barge office: For continuation of reconstruction of annex, and building pier in connection therewith, $100,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, to form an additional paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

"For purchase of necessary materials and equipment and for all necessary service for the installation, cost not to exceed $175,000, of pneumatic-tube service between the new custom-house and appraisers' stores, New York, N. Y., $175,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Red Wing, Minn., post-office: For site and completion of building under present limit, including $2,500 to reimburse the construction fund for extraordinary expenses incurred on account of foundation work, $12,500.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of asking a question, I move to strike out the last word. The sum of $12,500 is appropriated on page 30, line 11, for Red Wing, Minn. It states "for extraordinary expenses incurred on account of foundation work."

Mr. TAWNEY. The object is stated in the language of the bill. Why this is necessary, I will state to the gentleman. After the contract was let for the foundation for this building a defect was discovered in the foundation which could not have been ascertained or known prior to the work on the foundation. This defect necessitated the expenditure of an additional amount for the construction of the foundation.

Mr. SABATH. Who was responsible for the defect in the foundation—the contractor?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; the city of Red Wing is built on the banks of the Mississippi River. I understand there was in the early days a livery stable, since torn down and covered over so that its existence was not known, where the site for this building was selected. When they commenced work on the foundation, they were compelled to go much deeper than they anticipated. This fact was not ascertained and could not be ascertained prior to their beginning work on the foundation. Now, because of this additional cost in the foundation the appropriation will have to be increased; otherwise there will not be sufficient money to build a building of sufficient size to meet the needs of this growing and most prosperous city of my State. I would say to the gentleman that Red Wing is not in my district.

Mr. SABATH. And the department and Supervising Architect are willing to recommend the $12,500 in addition to the original contract?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; the Supervising Architect has recommended it in order to continue the work on the foundation and to complete the building.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of temporary quarters for the accommodation of government officials at Richmond, Va., $20,000.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Riverside, Cal., post-office: For site, continuation of building, under present limit, $50,000."

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, in explanation of this I will state that this is for a building in the district of my colleague [Mr. SMITH], and in a statement to me he disagreed with the statement made in the hearings. As to-day was a public holiday, I was unable to verify the matter, and I would ask that action on this amendment be postponed without prejudice until the matter can be inquired into.

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not consent, Mr. Chairman, to that. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia having been disposed of, I think we may as well dispose of this now as at any other time. The department has reported to Congress that the site has not been yet selected, and if we allow one amendment for the amount of the estimate for a building where the site has not been selected, there is no reason why we should not do it for all, and that would result in the appropriation of a great deal more money than can be expended in the fiscal year 1910. We did consent that the amendment of the gentleman from Washington should go over, for the reason that if he is right, then the amendment offered by him should be adopted; but the provision carried in a bill for another building should be stricken out of the bill.

That is the only reason why I asked that that go over. But in view of the fact that the site was not selected when this report was made, and the Supervising Architect informs us that the money can not be expended if the appropriation is made, it seems unnecessary to delay the consideration of the bill by a further discussion of the matter.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is it not true that a contract can be let for the full amount of the authorization, even if the appropriation is not carried in this bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly; there is an appropriation already made for Riverside of $30,000.

Mr. LAWRENCE. So that nothing is lost?

Mr. TAWNEY. No time is lost. The $30,000 will be available for the building, not for the plans and specifications, because an appropriation is carried in this bill for the plans and specifications, independent of the appropriation for the building. So the plans and specifications will be prepared, the foundations made ready, and the contract let for the completion of the building, and in the next sundry civil appropriation bill the amount that can be expended during the fiscal year 1911 will be put in the bill for the purpose of completing the building.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. All I desire is to ascertain if the committee have inquired into this proposition to know if the item comes within the rule.

Mr. TAWNEY. It does not come within the rule, because the site was not selected before January 15.

It is perhaps unfortunate for some Members of the House that their activity in selecting sites has not been as great as their activity to-day in the matter of seeking an appropriation. If they had been more active before this time, their buildings would have come within the rule, and the sites have been selected.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. There are a number of members of this committee who could not forego the opportunity to go down to Fort Monroe to see the battle fleet come in. Under such circumstances it was necessary to call the attention of some one else to the matter, and, it being a public holiday, it is impossible to get the information at the Treasury Department that is desired in reference to this item to-day as to dates.

Mr. TAWNEY. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The amendment of Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Springfield, Ohio, post-office: For additional land, and completion of the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of building under present limit, $35,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to correct the text of the bill, an error in the amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, line 17, strike out "thirty-five" and insert "twelve."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman let the Springfield, Tenn., item go over until to-morrow morning?

Mr. TAWNEY. I have no objection to letting it go over until to-morrow morning; but if the facts are as I understand them to be, I do not see what benefit the gentleman could derive from letting it go over. There is no building authorized.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is what I am trying to get. I want to get a building authorized.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman wants to get a building authorized, he will have to talk to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Tennessee is in the same fix as I am in, but I am keeping still.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to offer an amendment here.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman can offer his amendment, if he wishes to. Of course it will be subject to the point of order that the building is not authorized, and there is no way in which an appropriation for it can be carried in this bill until it is authorized.

The Clerk read as follows:

Tuscaloosa, Ala., post-office and court-house: For completion of building under present limit, $40,000.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 35, after line 19, insert the following as a new paragraph:
"Union City, Tenn., post-office: For site and completion of building under present limit, $37,000."

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, on January 8, as shown by the report, the department reported that that site had not been selected. Subsequent to that date the site was selected, but I am not prepared to assert here now that it was selected before the 15th of January. I do not know the exact date. On account of this being a holiday and the department being closed, I have been unable to ascertain.

The arbitrary rule adopted by the committee in fixing the 15th of January is, perhaps, a wise one, but at the same time it is really hard for some of us to understand why that should apply if the site had been adopted before the passage of this bill.

It is somewhat singular that all around me, so far as I can ascertain, every site that was appropriated for and every building appropriated for in the last bill, the site has been selected and purchased prior to the 15th of January except in my particular locality.

Mr. MACON. If the gentleman will pardon me for interrupting him, I will say that I have one at Paragould, Ark., in the same boat, and no appropriation is carried for it in this bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say that this proposition is identically in line with the others that have been offered. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury to the committee of Congress is:

Union City, Tenn.: The purchase of the site and construction of the building is authorized; limit of cost, $50,000. There has been appropriated $13,000 for the purpose of carrying out the authorization, but up to the time that this report was submitted in January last the site had not been selected. Any additional amount could not be expended during the fiscal year if appropriation is made.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The date of that letter is January 8, 1909.

Mr. GARRETT. The site has since been selected and purchased, as I was informed quite a number of days ago, but I am not prepared to say that it was selected before the 15th of January.

Mr. TAWNEY. The letter transmitting the report is dated on the 15th of January. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he, prior to the time of the reporting of this bill, made any inquiry as to whether or not the site had been selected?

Mr. GARRETT. I did, many days ago.

Mr. TAWNEY. Was any effort made by the gentleman or friends in the present fiscal year to facilitate the acquiring of the site, so that it could be ready to go on and secure the additional appropriation?

Mr. GARRETT. The agent of the Treasury Department was in that town in October or November of last year. I saw him at the time. Perhaps it was in August or early September.

Mr. TAWNEY. The authorization was made in the latter part of May, and the appropriation of $13,000 was made also in the latter part of May. What was done between that time and the last of October or November to procure the site?

Mr. GARRETT. I do not know; I communicated with the department and was advised that the agent would be there as soon as possible. The agent did call and examined this at the time he was examining all the Tennessee sites, all the places for Tennessee buildings. Every effort was made by the Representative from that district to hasten matters, and every effort was made by people there to hasten matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

Walla Walla, Wash., post-office and court-house: For site and continuation of building under present limit, $40,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I understand the paragraph in respect to Walla Walla is to go over with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] with respect to the appropriation for Everett until they can ascertain, in each case, whether the site has been selected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent——

Mr. TAWNEY. No; that was included in the request for unanimous consent this afternoon. I simply call attention to it now, so that there will be no question to-morrow if it becomes necessary to strike out Walla Walla.

The Clerk read as follows:

Authority is hereby given to close C street SW., between Fourteenth and Fifteenth streets, bounded on the north by block 231 and on the south by block 232, in the city of Washington, D. C., for use in connection with the erection of the building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a separate paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 19, page 38, insert:
"Provided, That no part of any appropriation made herein for public buildings shall be paid to members of the so-called Council of Fine Arts, created by executive order January 18, 1909, as compensation or expenses, and no part of such appropriation shall be expended on the preparation or formulation of any plans which have been submitted, or may be suggested, by said Council of Fine Arts."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there has been created by executive order a so-called "Council of Fine Arts." Under the order issued by the President, no federal official is permitted to select a site or to agree upon the plans for a public building, monument, or other work which may be artistic and monumental, unless the matter be first submitted to and approved by the so-called "Council of Fine Arts."

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman refers to structures that are either artistic or monumental. We all know that none of the federal buildings are artistic. Does the gentleman mean by that that they are constructed as monuments to the Members who get them?

Mr. FITZGERALD. From my own experience I believe they could properly be classed as monumental. However desirable it may be to have some body of competent men to pass upon the plans and designs for various monuments or structures erected for the Federal Government, I am sufficiently old fashioned in my notions of the theory of this Government to believe that such a body should be created by the legislative body and not by the executive.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from New York permit a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am not familiar with this executive order. Do I understand from the gentleman that its jurisdiction extends throughout the entire United States and applies to all public buildings wherever erected under authority of law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the effect, as nearly as I can make out from the correspondence which I find in the hearings on the sundry civil bill. There has been some very interesting correspondence between the President and Mr. Glenn Brown, representing the American Institute of Architects. I quote from one of the letters so that the committee may understand how far-reaching this matter is. The President says:

I shall direct all my Cabinet officers to refer to the council, for their expert advice, all matters in their charge embracing architecture, selection of sites, and landscape work, sculpture, and painting. Moreover, I shall request the council to watch legislation and on its own initiative to make public recommendations to the Executive and to Congress with regard to proposed changes in existing monuments, or with regard to any new project. I earnestly advise your body to take immediate steps to secure the enactment of a law giving permanent effect to what I am directing to be done. The course you advocate, and which I approve, should not be permissive with the Executive; it should be made mandatory upon him by act of Congress.

Further along in the hearings I find this order:

I direct that the heads of executive departments, bureaus, and commissions govern themselves accordingly. Hereafter, before any plans are formulated for any buildings or grounds, or for the location or erection of any statue, the matter must be submitted to the council I have named and their advice followed, unless for good and sufficient reasons the President directs that it be not followed. The Supervising Architect of the Treasury will act as the executive officer for carrying out the recommendations of the council.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 19, 1909.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question. Does he find in the hearings or anywhere any authority given to this Council of Fine Arts to tear down public buildings under the direction of the President, as well as to oversee the erection of them?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, upon the propriety of tearing down buildings, it appears there was no necessity to have specially qualified men tender their artistic views. Certain buildings having offended the artistic sense of one official of the Government; they were torn down at his order, regardless of the Council of Fine Arts.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Being ugly, they were self-condemnatory.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to repeat, it may be highly desirable to have some such body of men as this to pass upon public buildings in their design and location, but the duty of that body should be carefully prescribed and enumerated, and should be fixed by Congress and not by the Executive.

Not only are my views as to the theory of this Government that the legislative powers are lodged in the legislative department somewhat old fashioned, but they seem to be in harmony with the Constitution of the United States. My own views being strengthened by a reference to the Constitution, I was prompted to suggest this amendment. This amendment will accomplish two things. It will prevent in the first place the payment of a per diem and expenses to any one of these 30 eminent men who may be called to Washington or to one of the many places in the United States for the purpose of determining what particular site should be selected for a public building. For instance, if it were deemed necessary that this council should go to Yazoo, Miss., in order to pass upon the particular site determined for a public building and to see that it was located with reference to its utility and artistic surroundings, it would be impossible to pay these gentlemen, under this amendment, either for services or for expenses.

I have no doubt, however, knowing as I do about the renowned hospitality of the people of Yazoo, Miss., that if by any effort they could induce these distinguished gentlemen to visit their town, so that its public building would not be located in a manner that would be offensive to the artistic sensibilities of the residents of the town, they would willingly pay all of the expenses, and, indeed, add quite an additional sum for adequate compensation. That is true not only of Yazoo, but it is true of all other places. As an inducement, therefore, to the patriotic impulses of the people of the various sections of the country, I am anxious to prevent the payment from the public funds for such services and expenses. The other purpose to be accomplished by the amendment will be to prevent the expenditure of any public moneys in the preparation of plans which may, through any coercive methods, be submitted to this council——

Mr. DWIGHT. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). And I hope there will be no objection to the amendment. I now yield to my colleague.

Mr. DWIGHT. Does this order relieve the Supervising Architect from his duties, or is he to continue in his place without performing the duties of that office?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is difficult to say. He is made the executive officer through which the orders of the Council of Fine Arts shall be carried out. It may be somewhat suggestive that in the letter from the officer of the American Institute of Fine Arts he pays the Supervising Architect the compliment of saying that only under his particular department has there been any success realized in reaching artistic ideals, and that letter of this official of the American Institute of Architects suggests that the Supervising Architect of the Treasury should be the executive officer.

This led me, in my ignorance, almost to suspect that perhaps the Supervising Architect of the Treasury had been the instigating cause of this whole movement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand the gentleman from New York insists upon the archaic constitutional principle that no money once covered into the Treasury shall be paid out except by direction of law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Mississippi will recall that we listened to-day, with great attention, to the Farewell Address of George Washington. So impressed was I by that portion in which he referred to the danger of one department of the Government encroaching upon the other departments of the Government that I immediately took from beneath the heap of documents in my desk a copy of the Constitution of the United States and refreshed my memory as to the particular powers that had been granted to the various departments of the Government. Having found that the legislative power had been vested in the Congress, and fearing that perhaps somebody might be tempted to encroach upon the powers that have been delegated to the Congress, I thought I should do my small part to carry out that excellent advice proffered by the Father of his Country when he was retiring from public life. [Applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the gentleman from New York that his amendment is not offered at the proper place in this bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It will do well there, but I shall offer it at the next place [laughter]; there are two places, I think.

Mr. TAWNEY. At the end of the paragraph appropriating $800,000 for general expenses, for superintendence, preparation of plans and specifications——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where is that; on what page is it?

Mr. TAWNEY. Beginning on page 41 is where the limitation should be placed, because it is out of this appropriation, beginning on page 41, from which the expenses of this commission might be paid on the theory that they were employed in their professional capacity.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They might be paid out of appropriations for sites and buildings; but, Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to withdraw this amendment at this time and offer it at that place providing the committee will not insist that I repeat the speech I have just made in support of the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We will compromise on that promise.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, at first blush it appears as if the creation of this commission on art was a proposition to create a body coordinate with a committee of Congress, or with Congress itself, but when we analyze the matter we will find that its activities could really apply only to the executive branch of the Government. It is true that Congress has the right and power to prescribe, if it wishes to do so, the nature, style, and character of the public buildings. Congress has also the right to designate a particular site in each town for public buildings; but as a matter of practice, Mr. Chairman, those matters have heretofore been left entirely to the executive branch of the Government, namely, the Treasury Department.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But to officers designated by the law.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. In the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds we only authorize the appropriations for the purchase of a site or the erection of a building, and we do not specify where that particular site shall be located, nor do we specify the architectural style of the building.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But does not the law designate the particular officer who shall do these things, to wit, the Supervising Architect of the Treasury? And now the President undertakes to reverse that legislative action, naming a new body instead of the one that has been named by law.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. In answer to that, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that if Congress would exercise its power in designating the site in all the towns where public buildings are to be erected, and also specifying the architectural style of each building, then it would be unnecessary either for the executive department or any commission to do it.

As it is, that authority is now exercised by the Supervising Architect's Office; and, of course, if the Supervising Architect sees fit to consult outside talent, if he wishes in the matter of selection of sites and the selection of a particular style of building to listen to the expert testimony of a commission on art, he has a right to do so. But it does not seem to me, considering the present practice of Congress with regard to that matter, that the activity of that commission would in any way interfere with our business here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is in this bill a provision for a new public building in Washington. The site is designated. It is to be constructed under the supervision of the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds. He has had charge of the erection of two office buildings, which in their architecture have been eminently satisfactory to everybody.

Mr. PARSONS. In connection with those buildings there have been consulting architects, have there not, and one of them is a prominent member of this advisory committee?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is right; but the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds is a bureau official of the Department of the Interior, and he would not be able to do what he has done in these instances, nor select such professional assistants as he might desire and believe to be advisable, and to proceed on the plans formulated without having to submit those plans to this self-constituted commission of fine arts.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Only in case that Congress should neglect to exercise authority in prescribing in specific terms the character of the building.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Congress has never attempted to enact what the style of architecture or the plans should be, but there are certain officials of the Government charged with the duty of arranging these matters. To have some unofficial body authorized to say that these men should not perform their duties unless they satisfied them would be to make it impossible to select a site for a public building in any part of the United States without the utmost difficulty.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I suggest, further, that it would be within the province of any committee of Congress to call before them experts with a view of determining the style of a public building and determining what specific locality shall be selected for it.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me right there, the distinction between the statement of the gentleman and the proposition in regard to the commission of fine arts is this: If they have any power at all, this commission is clothed with the power of overriding the judgment even of Congress in respect to the character and style of architecture of the building and the location of the same.

There is a difference between acting in an advisory capacity and having absolute power to control action. The architects who assisted Mr. Wood in preparing plans for the office buildings acted only in an advisory capacity; he was not bound to accept their judgment. But, if I understand this order, if it has any legal effect at all, it clothes this commission with absolute power to determine the character of the architecture, as well as the location and style of the buildings——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing). Independent of any law that Congress may enact on the subject.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I think I have the floor, Mr. Chairman. I want to say, and this point ought to be clearly understood before we vote upon an amendment of this kind, that the advice of experts on art or architecture who offer their services either to the Supervising Architect or to any committee of Congress should be welcome to us. The Supervising Architect even now—for instance, in the case of the building at Denver—goes into the field and selects private architects for the purpose——

Mr. MANN. The law permits that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Under the Tarsney Act he is doing that all over the United States.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. This commission, in my judgment, could only act in an advisory capacity, and only in the absence of specific instructions from Congress. Congress has not exercised the authority. They could pass a bill here to designate exactly in what style a building is to be erected and where the site should be purchased. They do not do it. We leave it to the executive department, and when a matter of that kind comes to the executive department then that department can cooperate with such commission of experts in the matter of selecting the proper architectural style or the proper location for a building.

Mr. MANN. Now, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Taylor is now the Supervising Architect, is he not?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. The law, as we pass it for a public building, authorizes Mr. Taylor to prepare plans or to employ an architect from the outside to prepare plans. Is not that correct?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That is true.

Mr. MANN. Now, according to the papers, this order in reference to the Fine Arts Council prohibits Mr. Taylor from using his judgment either as to the plans or as to the employment of an architect on the outside and requires him to use the judgment of somebody else, who is not an official in any way. Does the gentleman think this leaves it to Mr. Taylor to use his judgment?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Taylor himself, as I am informed, is to be president of that commission.

Mr. MANN. But I want the gentleman to give us his opinion as to whether, under this order, Mr. Taylor is to be Supervising Architect, or Mr. Glenn Brown. Of course we all know these thirty will never all be present. Is it to be Mr. Taylor we will authorize by law, or Mr. Glenn Brown, who will supervise Mr. Taylor and direct him against his judgment what he shall do——

Mr. BARTHOLDT. In order to answer that question——

Mr. MANN. I have very great respect for Mr. Glenn Brown's judgment.

Mr. BARTHOLDT (continuing). It is first necessary to determine whether that commission would have a legal status and whether it would be entitled to recognition by Congress. I did not propose to pass upon that question in my remarks at this time.

Mr. MANN. Without reference to the legal status, from what we see in the papers, the Supervising Architect could not use his judgment. He must be willing to yield his judgment to that of an unofficial person or be fired.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to have the gentleman's time extended a minute or two to ask him a couple of questions. The gentleman from Missouri is a connoisseur in art. I want to ask him if this commission is the same that located General Grant's statue down here in a mud hole?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I am not able to tell my friend.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it true that the Supervising Architect of the Treasury refuses to furnish the same plans and specifications for any two public buildings in the United States? Do you know anything about that?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The Supervising Architect refuses to do what?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Refuses to furnish the same plans and specifications for any two public buildings.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. No; he does not refuse to do that, but he is guided by the condition of the ground. In other words, the conditions are not always the same; even in two particular cases, where the buildings may be exactly the same, special plans may have to be prepared because of the different conditions of the ground upon which the buildings are to be erected.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is that not a mere pretext to give a lot of men employment as draftsmen that would not be necessary if he had uniform plans and specifications for, say, $30,000 buildings, $40,000, $50,000, or $60,000 buildings, and just keep them in stock?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. As I understand, Mr. Chairman, the same plans are used and reused for many buildings. The architects tell me it is impracticable to do so in all cases of like appropriations, because of the different conditions of the ground, as I said before.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to answer that question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to get it out of him first. That difference would only apply in the foundation, would it not?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, the reason I asked the last two questions was for my own information. I think the commission made the greatest kind of a mistake when they located the Grant monument where they did. The reason I asked you these two questions is because it is stated in the press—I have heard it stated and believe it to be true—that the Supervising Architect refuses to use the same plans and specifications for two buildings, no matter whether the circumstances are precisely the same or whether the cost is the same or not; and if that is true, that is a kind of business that ought to be broken up.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in answer to the suggestions of my friend, that the Supervising Architect is very desirous of completing the work he has on hand. He has been very active in persuading the Secretary of the Treasury to assign more space to him. He has doubled his force of draftsmen. He has done these things for the purpose of satisfying Members of Congress and completing the work in which they are interested. Consequently, it is to his interest to use plans that have heretofore been used for other buildings as often as possible, and it is fair to suppose that if he does not use them there are good and sufficient reasons for his action, namely, that he can not use them on account of the difference in conditions.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. As a matter of fact, lots of these buildings are built on perfectly level ground. Now, it can not be true that with that kind of a condition existing he needs separate plans and specifications for every one of them. I can understand that a hilly piece of ground might possibly demand a different kind of a building, especially so far as the ground floor is concerned, from a building in a prairie country out in Missouri, Kansas, or Nebraska.

Mr. PARSONS. How about the materials?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The material ought to be the same in all of them.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That is not what I was going to talk about. I merely wanted to call the attention of the committee to the fact that if this art commission which has been created by the President goes to work, its advice will not extend to Congress, because we do not legislate on the questions upon which these gentlemen would give advice, but would apply only to the executive departments of the Government.

Mr. TAWNEY. How does the gentleman reconcile that statement with the language in the executive order:

> Hereafter, before any plans are formulated of any buildings or grounds, or for the location or erection of any statue, the matter must be submitted to the council I have named, and their advice followed, unless for good and sufficient reason the President directs that it be not followed.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That is exactly it, Mr. Chairman. We do not legislate with regard to the style of buildings, and we do not select the sites. Consequently, before a site is selected, and before the construction of the building is begun, the executive departments can secure, if they want to, the advice of just such experts as are the members of that art commission.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why is it that we have a corps of architects in the Treasury Department, and when we put up buildings like those at Annapolis and other places we have to go outside and employ architects and pay them from 10 to 15 per cent upon the face value of the building?

Mr. MADDEN. Only 5 per cent.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; you are mistaken about that.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. At West Point they do not pay that. They only pay 3½ per cent there.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. A few years back I got copies of the contracts and put them in the RECORD.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not West Point contracts for the new buildings there?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; I did not say West Point. I said Annapolis, and, I think, the White House also. Now, why do we keep that class of architects down in the Treasury Department, who, it seems—and I do not say it with disrespect—are not first class, and then when we want architects we have to go to New York for them?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. In answer to that, I need refer only to the scale of wages paid by the Government. The Supervising Architect of the Treasury receives, I believe, five or six thousand dollars a year, while a first-class architect in private life can make $25,000 a year. The men under Mr. Taylor receive, none of them, more than $2,500 or $3,000. When it comes to the expenditure of millions of dollars for great ornamental government buildings, then, in my judgment, it is desirable to secure outside talent for that purpose. The Government does not pay its servants enough to secure the highest talent.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean to say that we have architects who are capable of making plans and estimates for buildings which Congress goes by and then these architects have not gumption enough to put up the buildings, and hence we have to go to New York or elsewhere to get architects to make plans and put up the improvements?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I think the work performed by the Treasury Department speaks for itself. The government buildings in our country are a credit to the United States——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And so they are in the city of Nashville.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. And a credit to the Supervising Architect and the men employed by him.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But the architect in the case I speak of did not do the work, but went to New York.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. Can not we have the amendments reread?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask consent, Mr. Chairman, that the Clerk read the amendment which I have modified.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment, as modified by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 19, page 38, insert:

"Provided, That no part of any appropriation made in this act shall be paid to members of the so-called 'council of fine arts,' created by executive order under date of January 8, 1909, as compensation or for expenses; and no part of any such appropriation shall be expended in the preparation or formulation of any plans which have been submitted to, or approved or suggested by, said council of fine arts."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in reply to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] that no two buildings costing a similar amount could be erected exactly alike, unless they are built side by side under similar conditions. In the one case you may endeavor to erect a building in a locality where the labor conditions are such as to make a $30,000 building very much inferior to a $30,000 building in another locality. You may be obliged to transport the material a long distance and thereby be obliged to pay a larger amount of money for the material that enters into the construction of the building.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Does the gentleman wish to state that it is absolutely necessary to have different plans and different specifications, because the scale may be different?

Mr. MADDEN. It is necessary that different plans and different specifications be made for the construction of buildings that cost a similar amount. That is because, as I said, the labor conditions may not be similar, and, second, the material which is to enter into the construction of them may have to be transported so long a distance that the cost is double in one case what it would be in the other.

So that if you are obliged to pay twice as much for a thousand brick in one town as in another town, it can readily be understood that you can not put as many thousand bricks into the building for $30,000 as in a case where they would only cost half as much. It should be understood, too, that in some localities labor is much higher than in other localities, and in such cases you can not put up a building so ornamental for $30,000 as you can where the wages are only half as much.

There may be conditions where you are obliged to put the foundations for the building in rock and to excavate the rock in order to get a foundation for the building. In such cases nearly half the cost of the $30,000 building may be expended in excavation, and no one will undertake to say that under these conditions you can put up a building as ornate for $30,000 as you could under conditions totally dissimilar. In such a case everybody would agree that similar buildings could not be erected for $30,000.

So that a $30,000 building erected in one locality may be a different kind of a building from a $30,000 building erected in another locality. You may specify the same kind of material to enter into the construction of these buildings; but if you do, and the cost both of the manufacture and the transportation and the labor entering into the erection of the building being widely variant, you will have a different building for the $30,000 in one case than you have in the other, and everybody will agree that under such conditions one set of plans would not answer in both cases.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, no such difference in conditions exists as stated by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes; they do.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman is talking about the great city of Chicago.

Mr. MADDEN. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I have been in the building business all my life.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In the city of Chicago?

Mr. MADDEN. No; all over the United States, and I know what the conditions are.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There are not any two towns in the United States in which the difference of the price of pressed brick is double in one town what it is in another.

That is one of the conditions he stated. Take Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, most of Oklahoma and the Dakotas, and the vast majority of the land in those States is nearly as flat as the top of a table, and the same kind of a $50,000 building or a $60,000 building—very few of them are built as low as $50,000—that will do for a town of four or five thousand inhabitants in Illinois will do for the same kind of a town in any other of the States I have mentioned. The difference in the prices of labor is very little in country places. I can understand that if one piece of ground is hilly and another is flat, it will make a difference in the cost of the foundation, but in two towns that are built on flat ground there can not be $500 difference in building a $60,000 or a $75,000 house in one of them and building identically the same kind of a house in the other.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If my colleague will permit, supposing the excavations in the one case cost $3,000 and the excavations in the other case $6,000. There is $3,000 less left for the building, and consequently the plans will be different.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why not take that difference of foundation into consideration when making these allotments of money to us to build these public buildings around over the country?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. We can not know that in advance.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But the gentleman can inquire of the people who come here to get the buildings to see what kind of a piece of ground it is to be built on.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I suggest the selection of the site is made after we make the authorization.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand that, and I have never had anything to do with the selection of a site, and I never will have anything to do with it.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. KEIFER. In the gentleman's remarks a few moments ago he had something to say about the Grant monument.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to know if he knows who designed this monument down here, and especially the four pedestals on the corners and on which are located four emblems of the Kingdom of Great Britain in the form of a great bronze lion, put there in the attitude of a walrus in each case? [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I can not answer that, Mr. Chairman. I do not think that Great Britain has any patent on lions.

Mr. KEIFER. It has on the lion as an emblem.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it has, then a certain distinguished citizen of this Republic will soon be infringing that patent, as I understand. While I am at it I will state another fact, that I think whoever it was that remodeled the White House practically ruined it.

Mr. KEIFER. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman does not think it is so far ruined that he would not be willing to grace it sometime as its occupant?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know I would grace it any way it was fixed, if they give me a chance—be glad to do it, even in its present dismantled condition. [Laughter and applause.] I repeat that my information is that the Supervising Architect of the Treasury absolutely refuses to make two plans and sets of specifications for public buildings, though the appropriations are the same, and if it is true there is no sense in it. It is a waste of public money. I want to repeat a statement I made here the other day, that the deficiency in the revenues now amount to about $13,000,000 a month, and that deficiency is increasing every day, and that if the tariff debate drags on until the 1st of September, which it is likely to do, no sensible man will be surprised if the deficiency in the revenue amounts to $25,000,000 a month; and it is high time that we were cutting down the expenditures and appropriations somewhere. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I notice great applause of that sentiment, but I could not get the people to vote with me this morning.

Mr. TAWNEY. I move that all debate on the paragraph and amendment be now closed, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, pending that motion I would like to move to strike out of the amendment all after the word "or," so as to separate the amendment into two parts.

Mr. KEIFER. I thought that amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no.

Mr. DOUGLAS. And on that I want to say just a word.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate be now closed on the paragraph and amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that debate on the paragraph and amendments be now closed.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. PARSONS) there were—ayes 51, noes 12.

Mr. PARSONS. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that the Chair can not count on that point of order. The gentleman made the point of no quorum and the Chair can not count.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to make the point that no quorum was present.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that there is no quorum of the committee present——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is preceeding to count.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I want to overcome that slight technicality.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, can not we deman tellers?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is counting to ascertain whether a quorum is present.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And I was endeavoring to help the Chair.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS] desires to discuss this amendment for five minutes I have no objection.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I want to discuss the amendment for five minutes. In this amendment two things have been discussed together; one is absolutely separable from the other. One is to pay money to people not authorized by law to receive it and the other is——

Mr. TAWNEY. I will withdraw my motion to close debate.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I have made my point.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I understood the motion has been carried to close debate. I apprehend that the point of no quorum will have to be withdrawn before anything else can be done.

The CHAIRMAN. It is upon the motion to close debate that the point of no quorum was made, so the committee has not yet decided to close debate.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. But, Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman who makes the point of no quorum must withdraw it. The Chair having ascertained that no quorum is present, and not being able yet to count a quorum, until that point is withdrawn by the gentleman business can not be transacted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not yet completed the count. [After counting.] One hundred and one gentlemen are present, a quorum; and the motion to close debate is agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a separate vote on the two propositions contained in the amendment, and I would like for five minutes, by unanimous consent, to discuss the second proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman addressing the committee for five minutes?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object on account of the time wasted on the point of no quorum. I was willing to give time before, but not now.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I made no such point; I was trying to get leave to speak.

Mr. MANN. The two gentlemen are working together.

Mr. DOUGLAS. We are not working together.

Mr. PARSONS. I assume all responsibility.

Mr. MANN. I assume the responsibility of objecting, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will submit the first proposition to the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 19, page 38, insert:

"Provided, That no part of any appropriation made in this act shall be paid to members of the so-called Council of Fine Arts, created by executive order under date of January 18, 1909, as compensation or for expenses."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, if that part of the amendment should be voted down, there is nothing left. I ask that the amendment be voted on in its entirety. You can not divide that, for if the first part is voted down there is nothing left of the second part.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I submit that the second part is a totally distinct proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I submit that I did not draw it that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the second part reads as follows:

And no part of any such appropriation shall be expended in the preparation or formulation of any plans which have been submitted to or approved or considered by said Council of Fine Arts.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What appropriation? It is necessarily related to the first part of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from New York is correct, and the amendment is not divisible. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. PARSONS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 17.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum. On this matter we are entitled to a full vote, as it is an important one. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS] to raise the point of no quorum?

Mr. PARSONS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the action of the gentleman is evidently dilatory. He is doing it for a dilatory purpose. We just had a count of the committee, which disclosed a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. At the same time, the vote does not disclose a quorum, and the Chair will count.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, that point was once ruled upon by the Speaker.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] There are 103 gentlemen present—a quorum. So the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 28245) making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT IN PHILIPPINES.

The SPEAKER, in pursuance of a concurrent resolution of the House heretofore adopted, vacated his signature to an enrolled bill of the House (H. R. 25155) to amend an act approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

JOHN H. HAMAKER.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up Senate concurrent resolution No. 98, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be, and he hereby is, requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 4024) for the relief of John H. Hamaker.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

PRICE OF POWDER.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print a short letter in the RECORD from Mr. Robert S. Waddell, on the subject of powder prices, the amount of powder made, who makes it, and so forth.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

POWDER-TRUST POWDER PRICES—AMOUNT MADE IN UNITED STATES. THE INDEPENDENTS.

What a government witness says:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 1, 1909.

Hon. JOHN WESLEY GAINES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I listened to your debate in the House to-day on the smokeless-powder question with a great deal of interest. I have also read the discussions in the RECORD of the past few days, and desire to call your attention to a few items.

COST OF SMOKELESS POWDERS.

From personal knowledge, which has been confirmed by the office employees as well as several chemists and operatives in the plants of the du Pont trust, I give you herewith the items from the cost sheets of the trust:

	Cost per pound.
Ordnance smokeless powder	[a] $0.34
Military smokeless powder (30 cal.)	[b] .41

These cost sheets of the trust have for several years shown the cost of these powders at all of their plants not to exceed the figures stated, and frequently from 1 to 3 cents less per pound. This cost covers raw materials, including cotton, acids, alcohol, and ether, labor in manufacture, steam for boiling, power, interest on plant and working capital, depreciation of plant, proportion of administrative expense, freight for delivery to Government, cost of selling, including the lobby expense at Washington, and insurance.

Any price received for the powder in excess of above figures is clear net profit. There is no danger whatever attached to the manufacture of this powder. It is in a wet state for months after it is made.

Reference has been made to the time for drying the powder. It is true that it requires six months for the alcohol remaining in it to evaporate, but this is only for the larger grades for 12-inch guns. It requires about four months for 10-inch powder, three months for 8-inch, two months for 6-inch, and the powder for the smaller ordnance is dried in a little more than thirty days. The average time is about three and one-half months.

Frequent mention is made of the cost of alcohol. That is as much a part of the raw material as cotton, and is not a perfume added to the finished product. The alcohol is included in the cost of 43 cents per pound at Indianhead. All of the additional items suggested by the trust for the purpose of stimulating the price or cost of powder are pure fiction.

[a] Government now paying 67 cents for this powder.
[b] Government now paying 84½ cents for this powder.

Finished gun cotton ready for treatment with alcohol costs 16 cents. The alcohol, if all wasted, would add 3.8 cents per pound. But the alcohol is nearly all recovered by distillation and is used over and again, just as the acids are recovered and used many times.

Regarding the volume of business in the United States for a single year, I desire to give you the data:

Six hundred thousand kegs, 25 pounds each, black rifle powder; total, 15,000,000 pounds.

The Du Pont trust manufactures all of this.

Six million eight hundred thousand kegs blasting powder, 25 pounds each; total 170,000,000 pounds.

The Du Pont trust manufactures of this about 153,000,000 pounds.

And the 13 independent companies manufacture the remainder, about 17,000,000 pounds.

Four million five hundred thousand pounds smokeless sporting powder for shotguns and rifles.

The Du Pont trust manufactures nearly all of this, more than 96 per cent.

Four million six hundred thousand pounds smokeless ordnance and military powders, of which the Du Pont trust manufactures 3,000,000 and the Government at Indianhead and the army plant make about 1,600,000 pounds.

I will not burden you with the statistics showing the immense volume of dynamite made in this country, of which the Du Pont trust produces more than 80 per cent. Surely these figures will indicate the magnitude of this monopoly.

Very truly, yours,

ROBERT S. WADDELL,[a]
President Buckeye Powder Company, Peoria, Ill.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 23, 1909.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Edward E. Hale.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings; when, on request of Mr. HALE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. By the consent of the Senator from Wyoming, in charge of the agricultural appropriation bill, and in order to forward the business of the Senate, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 27523, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 27523) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the amendments of the committee be acted upon as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Secretary will proceed to read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in "Schedule A," under the subhead "Salaries of ambassadors and ministers," on page 3, after line 8, to insert:

The following provision of an act making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, be, and is hereby, repealed, namely:

"Whenever the President shall be advised that any foreign government is represented, or is about to be represented, in the United States by an ambassador, envoy extraordinary, minister plenipotentiary, minister resident, special envoy, or chargé d'affaires, he is authorized, in his discretion, to direct that the representative of the United States to such government shall bear the same designation. This provision shall in nowise affect the duties, powers, or salary of such representative."

And hereafter no new ambassadorship shall be created unless the same shall be provided for by act of Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to page 6, line 8.

Mr. HALE. An amendment was left out by mistake. On page 6, after line 8, I move to insert:

The President is hereby authorized to assign any regularly appointed secretary of embassy or legation to service in the Department of State, without change of salary, for a period not to exceed two years in any one case and of a number not to exceed three secretaries of embassy or legation at any one time. In each case the post from which the transfer is made may be filled by another appointment at the same salary, for which purpose the sum of $8,625, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 20, on page 9.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out lines 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25, at the bottom of page 9, in the following words:

CLERKS AT THE EMBASSY AT LONDON.

For two clerks at the embassy to Great Britain, one at the rate of $1,800 per annum and one at the rate of $1,200 per annum; $3,000.

And insert the following:

CLERKS FOR DISTRIBUTION OF INFORMATION.

For three clerks to be employed in the Department of State and to be charged with the distribution of information among the diplomatic missions, one at the rate of $1,800 per annum, one at the rate of $1,600 per annum, and one at the rate of $1,200 per annum; $4,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 18, to insert:

INSTALLATION OF A WATER SUPPLY AT PEKING, CHINA.

To provide for an adequate water supply and proper apparatus in the legation at Peking, China, as a protection against fire, $14,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "International Union of American Republics," on page 16, line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty-six" and insert "fifty-four;" and in line 5, after the word "bureau," to insert "or from the sale of the bureau publications," so as to read:

International Bureau of American Republics, $54,000: Provided, That any moneys received from the other American Republics for the support of the bureau, or from the sale of the bureau publications, shall be paid into the Treasury as a credit, in addition to the appropriation, and may be drawn therefrom upon requisitions of the Secretary of State for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the bureau.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "International Institute of Agriculture," on page 16, after line 24, to strike out:

For the payment of the quota of the United States for the support of the International Institute of Agriculture for the calendar year 1910, $4,800.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

For the payment of the quota of the United States for the support of the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, Italy, for the fiscal year 1910, $4,800; for the salary of one member of the permanent committee and for the actual and necessary expenses of delegates to the Grand Assembly of the Institute of Agriculture, $8,600; in all, $13,400, the said amount to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, after line 15, to insert:

INTERNATIONAL SANITARY BUREAU.

For the annual share of the United States for the maintenance of the International Sanitary Bureau for the year 1910, $2,830.79.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 14, to insert:

INTERNATIONAL SEISMOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.

For defraying the necessary expenses in fulfilling the obligations of the United States as a member of the International Seismological Association, including the annual contribution to the expenses of the association, and the expenses of the United States delegate in attending the meetings of the commission, $1,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to page 20, line 16, the last paragraph read being as follows:

The judicial authority and jurisdiction in civil and criminal cases now vested in and reserved to the consul-general of the United States at Shanghai, China, by the act of June 30, 1906, entitled "An act creating a United States court for China and prescribing the jurisdiction thereof," shall, subsequent to June 30, 1909, be vested in and exercised by a vice-consul-general of the United States to be designated from time to time by the Secretary of State, and the consul-general at Shanghai shall thereafter be relieved of his judicial functions.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not wish unduly to delay the bill, but this relates to a very important matter which is provided for in a general law which was considered with very great care, and an attempt to amend which was very persistently made during the last session of Congress. However, it did not meet with favor by the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is impossible for me to tell, without having the act before me, to what extent this amendment is vital. If I am not mistaken as to the law to which it refers, and if I am, of course I shall be glad to be corrected——

Mr. HALE. What is the Senator referring to?

Mr. BACON. I refer to the amendment on page 20, which has just been read by the Secretary.

Mr. HALE. There is no amendment of the committee on page 20.

Mr. BACON. It is no amendment by the Senate committee, but the provision comes from the House.

Mr. HALE. It is a provision in the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. BACON. We are interested in legislation which comes from the House, as well as in amendments offered by the Senate committee.

Mr. HALE. We could hardly call a clause in the bill, as passed by the House, an amendment. It is in the bill as it comes to us from the other House.

Mr. BACON. I did not mean to be understood that it is an amendment to the House bill. I am speaking of the provision as it is embodied in the House bill, which is an amendment to an existing law. That is what I refer to, and I say, if I am not mistaken in my understanding of it, and, in fact, I can not be, it is an amendment to the act creating a United States court for China and prescribing the jurisdiction thereof, a most important piece of legislation.

I will say that the law which this provision seeks to amend is one which was most carefully considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations. It was committed to a subcommittee, of which Senator Spooner and myself were members. I think we were the only members of the committee, if I recollect aright, though I may be mistaken in that.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator is right.

Mr. BACON. The matter was considered with the utmost care and deliberation for weeks, and upon the report made by the subcommittee the Committee on Foreign Relations recommended a favorable report to the Senate, and it was enacted into law. Ever since the passage of that act there has been a most active and persistent effort made to amend and change the provisions of the law. During the entire period of the last session of Congress there were persons here who were interested in it, making the most vigorous and persistent effort to have vital and important changes made in the provisions of the act. It was before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the question of changing and amending the law was again most carefully considered. The Committee on Foreign Relations did not approve of it, and the Senate did not take any action in regard thereto.

Now, Mr. President, what could not be accomplished by direction in the way of repealing and amending the law is sought to be accomplished by a provision in this diplomatic and consular appropriation bill. I think it is a matter of too much importance to be decided in this way, without any opportunity to consider it.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out the clause in the bill from line 7 to line 16, inclusive.

Mr. BACON. Very well; I am very much gratified that the Senator will do that. I wish to say further, in order that we may not be misunderstood, that if any change of the law is required, I shall be more than happy to cooperate in making proper changes, but I do not think a change ought to be made in this bill.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out lines 7 to 16, inclusive, on page 20, in the following words:

The judicial authority and jurisdiction in civil and criminal cases now vested in and reserved to the consul-general of the United States at Shanghai, China, by the act of June 30, 1906, entitled "An act creating a United States court for China and prescribing the jurisdiction thereof," shall, subsequent to June 30, 1909, be vested in and exercised by a vice-consul-general of the United States, to be designated from time to time by the Secretary of State, and the consul-general at Shanghai shall thereafter be relieved of his judicial functions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "International commission on private and public international law," on page 22, line 12, after the word "the," to strike out "third international conference" and insert "Third International Conference;" in line 24, before the word "ten," to strike out "the sum of;" and on page 23, before the word "to," to strike out "is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," so as to make the clause read:

For the payment of compensation to, and of the necessary expenses of, a commissioner to represent the United States in the international commission, which, in pursuance of the convention signed at the Third International Conference of American States, on August 23, 1906, approved by the Senate on February 3, 1908, and ratified by the President on February 8, 1908, is to meet at the city of Rio de Janeiro in May, 1909, for the purpose of preparing draft codes of private and public international law regulating the relations between the nations of America; and for the payment of the quota of the United States of the expenses incident to the preparation of the drafts, including the compensation of the experts provided for in article 4 of the said convention, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 2, to insert:

THE HAGUE INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS.

For the participation by the United States in an international congress to be held at The Hague at such time as the Netherlands Government shall fix, for the purpose of promoting uniform legislation concerning letters of exchange, including compensation of and the actual and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses of an expert delegate and a secretary, $9,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "International office of public health," on page 23, line 15, after the word "the," to strike out "international office of public health" and insert "International Office of Public Health;" and in line 18, at the beginning of the line, to strike out "international sanitary convention" and insert "International Sanitary Convention," so as to make the clause read:

For the payment of the quota of the United States for the year 1909 toward the support of the International Office of Public Health, created by the international arrangement signed at Rome December 9, 1907, in pursuance of article 181 of the International Sanitary Convention signed at Paris on December 3, 1903, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 21, to insert:

INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION FOR THE REVISION OF THE INTERNATIONAL CLASSIFICATION OF DISEASES AND CAUSES OF DEATH.

For the payment of the actual and necessary traveling expenses of delegates to represent the United States on the International Commission for the Revision of the International Classification of Diseases and Causes of Death, called by the Government of France to meet at Paris in 1910, $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; such delegates to be designated by the Secretary of State, one from the Medical Department of the Army, one from the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery of the Navy, one from the Bureau of Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, one from the Census Office, and two additional delegates to be selected at large.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, after line 10, to insert:

PURCHASE OF PROPERTY FOR LEGATION PURPOSES AT TOKYO, JAPAN.

Purchase of residence erected by Mr. R. S. Miller, Japanese secretary to the embassy at Tokyo, at his own expense, on ground held by the United States in perpetual lease for legation purposes in Tokyo, $3,267.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in Schedule B, under the subhead "Salaries, consular service," on page 24, line 25, after the word "six," to insert "and the act approved February 3, 1909, entitled 'An act to amend an act to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States,'" so as to make the clause read:

For salaries of consul-general and consuls, as provided in the act approved May 11, 1908, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States,' approved April 5, 1906," and the act approved February 3, 1909, entitled "An act to amend an act to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States," as follows: Consul-general, $303,000; consuls, $734,000; in all, $1,037,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, after line 5, to insert:

The President is hereby authorized to assign any regularly appointed consul of class 7 or 8 to service in the Department of State, without change of salary, for a period not to exceed two years in any one case and to a number not to exceed three consuls at any one time. In each case the consulate from which the transfer is made may be filled by another appointment at the same salary. To carry out this provision, $9,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in Schedule C, under the subhead "Salaries of consular assistants," on page 25, after line 23, to strike out:

For 20 consular assistants as provided for by law, $25,300; 10 additional consular assistants, subject to the same provisions of law as the above 20, $10,000; total, $35,300.

And to insert:

For 13 consular assistants as provided for by law, $18,300; 7 additional consular assistants, subject to the same provisions of law as the above 13, $7,000; total, $25,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. LODGE. I offer an amendment to be inserted on page 24, after line 17.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, after line 17, it is proposed to insert:

For the purchase of building and grounds, or of a site and the erection of a building thereon, in the city of Paris, France, for the use of the embassy and for the residence of the ambassador at that capital, and for furnishing the same and, if necessary, otherwise adapting it to the needs of the service, $400,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. HALE. I desire to move to lay the amendment on the table, but——

Mr. LODGE. I have the floor, I think.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. I do not propose to interfere with the Senator, but as soon as he is through I shall move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not desire to debate the amendment at any length, because it was thoroughly debated here last spring and was placed upon the public-buildings bill by a vote of the Senate. It has passed the Senate twice as a separate bill without dissent. The matter has been so thoroughly gone into that I have no desire to enter into any further discussion, but I shall be glad to have a vote upon it. If the Senator from Maine moves to lay it on the table I shall ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. I make that motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves to lay the amendment submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts on the table. On that question the Senator from Massachusetts demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for a division.

There were, on a division—ayes 25, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. LODGE. I ask again for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. The feeling of the Senate is very plain. It will take less time to have the yeas and nays, although I am sorry to have a roll call.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NELSON. Before the vote is taken I should like to have the amendment read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Secretary again read Mr. LODGE's amendment.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts, before the vote is taken, if he will accept an amendment reducing the amount?

Mr. HALE. I think I must insist on my motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. CLAY. I should be glad to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I ask the Senator if this amendment was before the Committee on Appropriations and unanimously reported against?

Mr. HALE. Of course it was.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Before the vote is taken, I ask the Chair to define to the Senate the question to be disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts proposed an amendment, which was read, and the Senator from Maine has moved to lay that amendment on the table. The vote is being taken upon the motion of the Senator from Maine. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIXON (when his name was called). I dislike to interrupt the roll call, but I understand that to vote "yea" is to vote to lay the amendment on the table appropriating $400,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct in his understanding of the question.

Mr. DIXON. I vote "yea."

Mr. FLINT (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] is detained from the Senate on account of sickness. I am sure that if my colleague were here he would vote "yea," and I take the liberty of saying to the Senator from California that he can vote.

Mr. FLINT. On the statement of the junior Senator from Texas, I vote "yea."

Mr. FULTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. ANKENY] and vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BAILEY (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe in the recapitulation that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] is not recorded. As I have a general pair with him I think it proper to withdraw my vote.

Mr. CULLOM (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. CULLOM. I withdraw my vote; I supposed that he was present when I voted.

The result was announced—yeas 47, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—47.

Bankhead	Dolliver	La Follette	Piles
Borah	Flint	Long	Platt
Bourne	Foraker	McCumber	Rayner
Brown	Frazier	McLaurin	Richardson
Bulkeley	Fulton	Milton	Simmons
Burkett	Gary	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Burrows	Gore	Nixon	Smoot
Clapp	Hale	Overman	Stephenson
Clarke, Ark.	Hemenway	Page	Taylor
Clay	Heyburn	Paynter	Teller
Dick	Johnston	Penrose	Tillman
Dixon	Kittredge	Perkins

NAYS—24.

Bacon	Depew	Guggenheim	Smith, Mich.
Beveridge	Dillingham	Kean	Stone
Brandegee	du Pont	Knox	Sutherland
Carter	Foster	Lodge	Warner
Clark, Wyo.	Frye	McCreary	Warren
Daniel	Gallinger	Money	Wetmore

NOT VOTING—21.

Aldrich	Culberson	Gamble	Owen
Ankeny	Cullom	Hansbrough	Scott
Bailey	Cummins	Hopkins	Taliaferro
Briggs	Curtis	McEnery
Burnham	Davis	Martin
Crane	Elkins	Newlands

So Mr. LODGE's amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, in reference to the vote just taken, I desire, with the permission of the Senate, to say a word. I made the inquiry of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] whether he would withhold his motion, or practically to that effect, if the amount were reduced. My purpose in so doing was to meet what I knew to be the objection of a number of Senators, not to the proposal to purchase or provide for an embassy in Paris, but to the amount involved. I thought that the former action of the Senate had indicated that the amount proposed in the amendment would not be acceptable to the Senate, and therefore I proposed myself to try to meet the views of Senators who had that objection; but the response of the Senator from Maine indicates that it would not be of avail to move an amendment proposing a smaller amount, so I shall not do so.

I simply desire to repeat what I have said on a former occasion, that under our present system, where we have no embassies, the appointment of ambassadors to great powers is practically limited to millionaires; and I desire that we shall make some provision for housing our ambassadors, so that men who are not millionaires may be eligible to such appointments.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following joint resolutions:

S. R. 76. Joint resolution relative to homestead designations, made and to be made, of members of the Osage tribe of Indians;

S. R. 88. Joint resolution to provide for an accounting of certain funds held in trust for the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota; and

S. R. 126. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to donate six condemned canon to the city of Cheyenne, Wyo.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20111) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia," relative to gambling, bucket shops, and bucketing.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate (No. 98) requesting the President to return to the Senate the bill (S. 4024) for the relief of John H. Hamaker.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24835) authorizing the necessary resurvey of public lands, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MONDELL, Mr. VOLSTEAD, and Mr. ROBINSON, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

S. 5989. An act authorizing the Department of State to deliver to Maj. C. De W. Willcox decoration and diploma presented by Government of France;

S. 7829. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Keithsburg, in the State of Illinois, and to establish it as a post-road," approved April 26, 1882;

H. R. 26068. An act providing for an additional judge for the western district of Pennsylvania, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 27139. An act to provide for the sittings of the United States circuit and district courts of the northern district of Ohio at the city of Youngstown, in said district.

GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under House concurrent resolution No. 68, the Chair announces the cancellation of his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 25155) to amend an act approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act to temporarily provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN IDAHO AND WYOMING.

Mr. FULTON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 8446) to create an additional division in the judicial district of the State of Idaho, to report it with an amendment, and I submit a report (No. 1068) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to this bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That section 3 of an act to amend an act to provide the times and places for holding terms of the United States courts in the States of Idaho and Wyoming, approved July 5, 1892, as amended by the amendatory act approved November 3, 1893, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That for the purpose of holding terms of the district court said district shall be divided into four divisions, to be known as the northern, central, southern, and eastern divisions. The counties of Shoshone, Kootenai, and Bonner, including any and all Indian reservations in one of more of said counties, shall constitute the northern division, the court for which shall be held at Coeur d'Alene city, in the county of Kootenai. The counties of Latah, Nez Perce, and Idaho, including any and all Indian reservations in one or more of said counties, shall constitute the central division, the court for which shall be held in the town of Moscow, in Latah County. The territory composing the counties of Ada, Boise, Blaine, Cassia, Twin Falls, Canyon, Elmore, Lincoln, Owyhee, and Washington, including any and all Indian reservations within the said territory, shall constitute the southern division, the court for which shall be held in Boise, situated in said Ada County. The territory composing the counties of Bingham, Bear Lake, Custer, Fremont, Bannock, Lemhi, and Oneida, including any and all Indian reservations within such territory, shall constitute the eastern division, the court for which shall be held at the town of Pocatello.

"That any new county created out of any such territory shall remain a part of the division out of which it, or a larger portion thereof, shall be created; but if a portion of a county of one division shall be attached to a county of another division, it shall become a part of the latter division."

SEC. 2. That section 6 of said act approved June 1, 1898, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That the terms of the district court for the district of the State of Idaho shall be held at Coeur d'Alene City, beginning on the third Monday of April and the third Monday of July in each and every year; at the town of Moscow, beginning on the second Monday of May and the first Monday of November of each and every year; at Boise City, beginning on the second Monday of February and the second Monday of September of each and very year; at Pocatello, beginning on the second Monday of March and the second Monday of October of each and every year, and the provision of any statute now existing, providing for the holding of state courts on any day contrary to said act, is hereby repealed, and all suits, prosecutions, process, recognizance, bail bonds, and other things pending in or returnable to said court are hereby transferred to and shall be made returnable to and have force in the said respective terms in this act, provided in the same manner and with the same effect as they would have had had said existing statute not been repealed.

"SEC. —. That the clerk of the district and circuit courts for the district of Idaho and the marshal and district attorney for said district shall perform the duties appertaining to their offices, respectively, for said courts of said several divisions of said judicial district. Whenever in the judgment of the district and circuit judges the business of said courts hereafter shall warrant the employment of a deputy clerk at Coeur d'Alene City, new books and records may be opened for the said court and a deputy clerk appointed to reside and keep his office at Coeur d'Alene City."

SEC. 3. That section 3 of said act be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect from and after its approval."

COMPANIES B, C, AND D, TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair, under the unanimous-consent agreement of February 2, lays before the Senate Senate bill 5729, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5729) to correct the records and authorize the reenlistment of certain noncommissioned officers and enlisted men belonging to Companies B, C, and D of the Twenty-fifth U. S. Infantry who were discharged without honor under Special Orders, No. 266, War Department, November 9, 1906, and the restoration to them of all rights of which they have been deprived on account thereof.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the unanimous-consent agreement may be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the unanimous-consent agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that on Tuesday, February 23, 1909, at 1 o'clock p. m., the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 5729) to correct the records and authorize the reenlistment of certain noncommissioned officers and enlisted men belonging to Companies B, C, and D of the Twenty-fifth U. S. Infantry, etc., debate to proceed under the ten-minute rule, and that at 4 o'clock on the said day a vote will be taken upon the bill and amendments that may be pending or that may be offered; the same not to displace the unfinished business, S. 6484. (February 2, 1909.)

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, unless some Senator desires to address the Senate on this bill, I ask that it may be temporarily laid aside, to be taken up whenever any Senator may desire to speak, or when the hour of 4 o'clock shall have been reached, that being the hour fixed for taking a vote on it. In other words, I do not care to speak further on the bill unless some Senator, by some remarks he may make, may cause me to think I should do so.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I ask, what was the request of the Senator from Ohio? He would expect, of course, to have time to answer any speeches that may be made, providing they shall be interposed between now and 4 o'clock.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; to answer, so far as I may, under the rule.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senate has taken notice of the fact that we may either proceed with the Brownsville bill or go on with other business.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio has asked that the bill before the Senate be temporarily laid aside, its consideration to be resumed whenever any Senator desires to speak upon it, and at 4 o'clock, if no Senator desires to speak previous to that time——

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. At that time, of course, we take the vote.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent to resume the consideration of the bill which was being read——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Idaho to ask for the consideration of the bill that was interrupted at 1 o'clock.

Mr. DANIEL. I want to say a word about the pending matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. DANIEL. I did not rise to make a speech upon this subject, but I wish to make a few remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia will suspend until the Senate is in order. There is too much audible conversation in the Chamber.

Mr. DANIEL. I had supposed that the Senator——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia rise to discuss——

Mr. DANIEL. The pending matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT (continuing). The pending matter?

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN IDAHO AND WYOMING.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent—it will not interfere with the pending matter—that the reading and consideration of the bill which was under consideration when the hour of 1 o'clock arrived be finished. It will take but a minute. Otherwise, the bill will be left suspended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TILLMAN. What is the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is to provide a place for holding court in Idaho.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the resumption of the consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from Idaho?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 8446) to provide an additional district in the judicial district of the State of Idaho.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill amending an act entitled 'An act to amend an act to provide the time and places for holding terms of the United States court in the States of Idaho and Wyoming,' approved June 1, 1898."

REPORT OF JAMESTOWN TERCENTENNIAL COMMISSION.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, transmitting the final report of the Jamestown Tercentennial Commission, etc. (S. Mr. CULLOM submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $16,033.72 to pay the Potomac Electric Power Company for furnishing electric current for the Senate Office Building, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FORAKER submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the improvement of Lock and Dam No. 37, Ohio River, from $150,000 to $380,000, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WETMORE submitted an amendment providing for the improvement of Newport Harbor, Rhode Island, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment providing for the improvement of Point Judith Pond, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BULKELEY submitted an amendment providing for the improvement of the Connecticut River up to the city of Hartford, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to strike out the words "and the development of water power in connection with the improvement of the Connecticut River from Hartford, Conn., to Holyoke, Mass.," intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAILEY submitted an amendment providing for the improvement of the navigable capacity of Sabine and Neches rivers and of the channel connecting the Sabine and Neches rivers with the mouth of Taylors Bayou, in the State of Texas, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DANIEL submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $120,000 in full of all debts, claims, or demands on the part of the State of Virginia or of her assignee arising out of the act of the general assembly of Virginia of December 27, 1790, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DIXON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,000 for fencing the national bison range, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

Mr. CUMMINS submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 6484) to establish postal savings banks for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PUBLIC-BUILDING ACTS.

Mr. GORE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 28167) to grant additional authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out certain provisions of public-building acts, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—DAVID K. MITCHELL.

On motion of Mr. FORAKER, it was Ordered, That there may be withdrawn from the files of the Senate all papers relative to the bill (S. 7559, 60th Cong., 2d sess.) granting an increase of pension to David K. Mitchell, there having been no adverse report on said bill.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. M. C. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On February 19, 1909:

S. 6155. An act to provide for an enlarged homestead.

On February 20, 1909:

S. 8048. An act to withdraw from settlement and entry certain lands in the State of California.

On February 23, 1909:

S. 8708. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to donate two condemned cannon to Moores Creek Battle Ground Association.

COMPANIES B, C, AND D, TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (S. 5729) to correct the records and authorize the reenlistment of certain noncommissioned officers and enlisted men belonging to Companies B, C, and D, of the Twenty-fifth U. S. Infantry, who were discharged without honor under Special Orders, No. 266, War Department, November 9, 1906, and the restoration to them of all rights of which they have been deprived on account thereof.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the pending bill contains two sections. The first is one ordering a court of inquiry—

To hear and report upon all charges and testimony relating to the shooting affray which took place at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906.

It requires the court of inquiry to consist of five officers, none of them to be under the rank of colonel, and then provides that—

Said court shall, within one year from the date of its appointment, make a final report, and from time to time shall make partial reports, to the Secretary of War of the results of such inquiry, and such soldiers and noncommissioned officers of Companies B, C, and D, of the Twenty-fifth Regiment U. S. Infantry, who were discharged from the military service as members of said regiment, under the provisions of Special Orders, No. 266, dated at the War Department the 9th day of November, 1906, as said court shall find and report as qualified for reenlistment in the Army of the United States shall thereby become eligible for reenlistment.

I do not know that there is any substantial objection to this section, but I call attention to it as it is the prefix of section second. About the matter, this observation seems to be pertinent, as there is a great deal of misunderstanding in the country with respect to the status of the soldiers discharged. There are three kinds of discharge from the Army of the United States. One is with honor, another is with dishonor, and between the two there is a neutral discharge known in the British army as "a bob-tail discharge," and by the expression commonly quoted in this country as "a discharge without honor"—that is to say, a colorless discharge, imposing no penalty upon the soldier, but simply dispensing with his service.

Such discharges are not rare. I am told that during the Spanish war the services of many enlisted men were simply dispensed with and their names stricken from the rolls because they were not wanted. They were ne'er-do-wells. They were not satisfactory, and, without being blasted with the stigma of dishonor or commended by the title of honor, they were simply eliminated from the service of the United States. That is the case with respect to the soldiers discharged on account of the disturbance at Brownsville. That discharge does not attach conviction of guilt to anyone, neither does it acquit them with honor. It arose from the fact that being under obligation as soldiers, they fell under circumstances of suspicion by reason of the fact that it was known, by the testimony of eyewitnesses and by complete circumstantial evidence, that some of them were guilty, although the identical people could not be marked out and named.

As to all of these soldiers, it is not only proposed to have this court of inquiry, and that those who may pass through that inquiry acceptably may be reenlisted, but section 2 provides:

SEC. 2. That any noncommissioned officer or private who shall be made eligible for reenlistment under the provisions of the preceding section shall, if reenlisted, be considered to have reenlisted immediately after his discharge under the provisions of the special order hereinbefore cited, and to be entitled, from the date of his discharge under said special order, to the pay, allowances, and other rights and benefits that he would have been entitled to receive according to his rank from said date of discharge as if he had been honorably discharged under the provisions of said special order and had reenlisted immediately.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that section 2 is objectionable. There is no doubt of one fact, and that is that these men were legally discharged after most careful consideration of the case in which they were involved. There is no doubt about the fact that examination and reexamination was made, and that the view taken by those who had the best opportunity to know and to investigate the affair was finally confirmed.

It may be that an unfortunate case may arise amongst these soldiers; it may be that a number of them were totally innocent, but they are so involved in the cloud and doubt that arises with respect to them that it is not a case for the equitable intervention of Congress to pay them while they were out of the service all the pay and allowances that a true and good soldier has assured to him while in it. For that reason I move to strike out section 2.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia moves to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. FORAKER. I move that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia be laid on the table.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the amendment be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia moves to strike out the second section of the bill, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 2. That any noncommissioned officer or private who shall be made eligible for reenlistment under the provisions of the preceding section shall, if reenlisted, be considered to have reenlisted immediately after his discharge under the provisions of the special order hereinbefore cited, and to be entitled, from the date of his discharge under said special order, to the pay, allowances, and other rights and benefits that he would have been entitled to receive according to his rank from said date of discharge as if he had been honorably discharged under the provisions of said special order and had reenlisted immediately.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that, under the unanimous-consent agreement——

Mr. FORAKER. I was about to say that I made the motion I did without having the unanimous-consent agreement in mind. Under the agreement, I suppose the amendment will have to go over until 4 o'clock, to be then voted on. So I withdraw the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia will be regarded as pending, to be considered when the hour of 4 o'clock is reached.

Mr. du PONT. I should like to hear the amendment stated again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 2.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 27054) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be read for amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. FLINT. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 20, strike out the words "two hundred and fifty" and insert "four hundred," so as to read:

For the procurement or reclamation of land, or right pertaining thereto, needed for site, location, construction, or prosecution of works for fortifications and coast defenses, $400,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, when the bill was before the committee there was nothing before it on this subject except the report of the special board. Therefore the committee failed to give it particular consideration, believing that the $250,000 proposed to be appropriated by the House of Representatives was sufficient. That amounts to about $1,470 per acre for 170 acres. Since then my colleague appeared before the general committee, and the general committee authorized the Senator in charge of the bill to accept the increase.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator a question. This is to buy certain land?

Mr. PERKINS. It is to purchase about 170 acres of land in Los Angeles County, at the port called San Pedro, and at the price of $250,000 it would be about $1,470 an acre. The amendment proposes to increase it to $400,000, which would be $2,354 an acre. I know nothing myself of the value of the land, but my colleague is a resident of Los Angeles, and is quite familiar with it. An estimate has already been made by the Secretary of War.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, at the last session of Congress a provision was included in the fortifications bill for the appointment of a commission to make an investigation as to the necessity and advisability of fortifying the port of San Pedro, which is the port for the city of Los Angeles. A commission was appointed by the War Department, which visited the place and made a full report. They have conferred with the commercial bodies in that locality, and it is only by the assistance and cooperation of the commercial bodies that the land can now be acquired for this price. The War Department has recommended the appropriation of $400,000 to purchase this land. The commission which was appointed to investigate the matter recommended that Congress appropriate $500,000, but the War Department reduced this to $400,000. It is idle to appropriate $250,000 when the recommendation is for $400,000. If this amount should not be appropriated it will be idle to make any appropriation.

Mr. LODGE. I know very little about the details of this matter, except that $2,350 an acre for land for fortifications, 170 acres, seems a large price. I have been told that land there within a few years sold for $5 to $10 an acre.

Mr. FLINT. I should like to ask the Senator who told him that.

Mr. LODGE. I was told that in private conversation.

Mr. FLINT. I should like to know who made such a statement, because I am familiar with the price of this land. It is near a city—the city of San Pedro—and, as a matter of fact, if we do not buy the land now it will not be possible to acquire the land necessary for this work; it will all be covered up with homes which will be built there, and the Government will have to pay a far greater price than it is now asked. It is only by making the appropriation at this time that we can have the fortifications at that point.

Mr. LODGE. I, of course, know nothing about what the land is worth.

Mr. FLINT. This is an important matter to southern California. The board was appointed and made a report, and if the members of the Appropriations Committee will read the report they will see that the board considers it of the greatest necessity to fortify this place at this time. To permit this matter to go by and not make the appropriation that the commercial bodies and the commission have recommended, as I said before, will be a great mistake.

Mr. PERKINS. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that the special report recommends:

It is recommended that only so much of the funds needed to provide for the protection of San Pedro Harbor, Cal., as is required for the purchase of the land, namely, $400,000, be appropriated at the present session of Congress.

My colleague appeared before the full committee and they authorized me to accept the amendment proposed by him, $150,000 in addition to the $250,000, making it $400,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from California ought in justice to the committee to say there was a divided opinion, if he is to quote what the committee did. There was no evidence presented to the committee that this is a fair price for the land. Even the report of the commission, if there was one, was not laid before the committee when I was present. I thought it was an exorbitant price, and I am inclined to think now it is an exorbitant price. It seems to me that $2,100 or $2,200 an acre for land for a fort is a very exorbitant value, and unless there is some overwhelming reason why we should appropriate $400,000 for this purpose, I certainly shall feel impelled to vote against the amendment.

Mr. KEAN. This is for land alone?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is for land alone.

Mr. FLINT. There is a very important reason why this land should be purchased. The city of San Pedro will extend to this very land unless we acquire it at this time. The commission has carefully investigated the matter and made a report to Congress, the report being dated November 9, 1908, and yet it is proposed, notwithstanding that the commission ask for $400,000, to appropriate only $250,000. I do not know whence the statement comes, and I should like to know who makes it, that the land can be purchased for anything like the price which has been named by the Senator from Massachusetts. The city is extending right up on this point.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask at what price land there has been actually sold?

Mr. FLINT. I do not know anything about that. I do know that a railroad has been built out there. If the land was about Boston, would $2,000 an acre be too high a price? There is a city growing up there.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know how large the city is.

Mr. FLINT. It is a small city.

Mr. LODGE. I asked what land was selling for in that neighborhood, and the Senator said he does not know. Now, I ask him what is the assessed valuation of the land?

Mr. FLINT. The Senator asked me the value of the land. I do not know. I am simply relying on the value placed on it by the commercial bodies of Los Angeles. If the price is too high, the land can be condemned. It is only, as I have said to the Senator from Massachusetts, by reason of the fact that the commercial bodies there have taken an interest in the matter that we can obtain the land at the present time for this price.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think there ought to be proper fortifications there, and I heartily favor them, and shall vote for them. I think there ought to be proper fortifications for a city like Los Angeles. It is a great and growing city, and this is its port, and it ought to be thoroughly fortified. I have no objection in the world to that, but the House put in a provision for $250,000, which is $1,400 an acre. We are buying a large tract—170 acres of land—and if the Government can not get it for $250,000, it can institute condemnation proceedings. But we have heard this morning of the necessity of saving money and the condition of the revenue. We have just voted down a measure that has passed the Senate twice, and it was voted down by the Senate on that ground. I see the force of it. Now, we are asked to add $150,000 to the House appropriation and pay $2,300 an acre for land. If we appropriate $250,000 and the land can not be bought for that sum, condemnation proceedings can be instituted. It is a bad time to add to the appropriations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the "noes" have it.

Mr. FLINT. A division!

Mr. GALLINGER. Manifestly the yeas and nays will be required if the Senator insists on his amendment, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TILLMAN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. What is the question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT].

Mr. TILLMAN. Increasing the appropriation from $250,000 to $400,000?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. A vote in the affirmative means $400,000?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Yes.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FULTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. ANKENY], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GAMBLE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. He being absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I inquire whether the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. STONE. I have a general pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called.) I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FOSTER. May I inquire if the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. FOSTER. I withhold my vote, having a pair with him.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 26, as follows:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment fails for want of an affirmative vote.

Mr. FLINT. I desire to reserve the amendment for consideration in the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment failed as in Committee of the Whole. The Senator can offer the amendment in the Senate when the bill reaches the Senate. If there are no further amendments to be offered as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. FLINT. I offer the amendment which I sent to the desk a few moments ago.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from California proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 21, before the word "thousand" strike out "two hundred and fifty" and insert "four hundred," so as to read:

For the procurement or reclamation of land, or right pertaining thereto, needed for site, location, construction, or prosecution of works for fortifications and coast defenses, $400,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just read.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DEPEW (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY]. I will withhold my vote until he returns.

Mr. FULTON (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr.

DAVIS] and the transfer of my pair to the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. ANKENY]. I vote "yea."

Mr. GAMBLE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], and vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I note the absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], with whom I have a general pair. If he were present I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 27, as follows:

So Mr. FLINT's amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 23464) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 28, 39, 40, 83, 84, 95, 99, 102, 105, 106, 109, 112, 113, 114, 131, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, and 189.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 24, 25, 26, 27, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 38, 41, 42, 44, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 69, 70, 71, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 96, 97, 98, 101, 103, 104, 107, 110, 111, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 132, 133, 134, 135, 137, 138, 139, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 158, 159, 160, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 171, 172, 173, 174, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 190, 191, and 208, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following: "; hire of horse and wagon for the Secretary's office, four hundred and twenty dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "eighty thousand four hundred and thirty dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "one hundred and forty-four thousand nine hundred and twenty dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "one hundred and sixty-seven thousand seven hundred and forty-four dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 45, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of said amendment, after the word "dollars," insert the following: "; or so much thereof as may be necessary;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 59, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said Senate amendment insert the following:

"Index to the Statutes at Large: For continuing the preparation of an index to the Statutes at Large of the United States, ten thousand dollars, to be expended by the Librarian of Congress for the salaries of the persons whom he employs to prepare the index and for incidental expenses; the scope, classification, and style of the index to be such as the Judiciary Committee of the two Houses of Congress shall direct or approve."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That under the authority of House concurrent resolution No. 67, this session, the bill be amended as follows:

On page 40, lines 18 and 19, strike out the words "twelve thousand dollars" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "eight thousand dollars, and the annual compensation of the Secretary of State, including all emoluments or allowances fixed by law, except such as were fixed by law prior to the twenty-sixth day of February, nineteen hundred and seven, after the third day of March, nineteen hundred and nine, is hereby fixed at eight thousand dollars, and all laws or parts of laws providing different compensation, emoluments, or allowances are hereby repealed, to take effect on the third day of March, nineteen hundred and nine, except that so much of the unexpended balance of the appropriation of twelve thousand dollars for the salary of the Secretary of State for the fiscal year nineteen hundred and nine as may be necessary is hereby made available to pay the said salary as herein fixed at the rate of eight thousand dollars per annum from March fourth until June thirtieth, nineteen hundred and nine, inclusive."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 72, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert the following: "chief clerk, two thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 100, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "forty thousand nine hundred and eighty dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 108, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "three thousand five hundred dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 136, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert the following: "one clerk of class four;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 140, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the matter inserted by said Senate amendment and strike out, on page 111, lines 21 and 22, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Six Indian inspectors, not required to be engineers, now employed and appropriated for in the Indian Department, at two thousand five hundred dollars each, and said Indian inspectors shall hereafter be termed inspectors, and shall be included in the classified service."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 156, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the number proposed by said amendment insert the following: "six;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 157, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "sixty-one thousand two hundred dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 161, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "sixty-six thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 169, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the number proposed insert "five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 170, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following: "four copyists of maps, at nine hundred dollars each;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 182, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$8,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

On amendments numbered 43, 46, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 209, and 210 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

F. E. WARREN,
J. A. HEMENWAY,
H. M. TELLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

HENRY H. BINGHAM,
F. H. GILLETT,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate still further insist on its amendments in disagreement and ask the House for a further conference, and that the President of the Senate shall appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. HEMENWAY, and Mr. TELLER conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

CLARENCE FREDERICK CHAPMAN.

Mr. DICK submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12499) for the relief of Clarence Frederick Chapman, U. S. Navy, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

CHARLES DICK,
THOMAS S. MARTIN,
JOHN WALTER SMITH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

THOMAS S. BUTLER,
ERNEST W. ROBERTS,
A. W. GREGG,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

COURTS IN WASHINGTON AND OREGON.

Mr. FULTON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 27061) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the western district of Washington, to report it favorably with an amendment, and I submit a report (No. 1070) thereon.

Mr. PILES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment was to add to the bill the following additional sections:

SEC. 3. That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint an additional judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Oregon, who shall reside in said district and who shall possess the same powers, perform the same duties, and receive the same salary as the present judge of said district.

SEC. 4. That the present district judge in said district of Oregon and the one appointed under this act shall agree between themselves upon the division of business and assignment of cases for trial in said district: Provided, however, That in case the said two district judges do not agree, the senior circuit judge of the ninth circuit shall make all necessary orders for the division of business and the assignment of cases for trial in said district.

SEC. 5. That hereafter, and until otherwise provided by law, in addition to the terms of the United States circuit and district courts now required by law to be held at the city of Portland, in the district of Oregon, there shall be held annually one term of said courts at the following-named places in said district of Oregon at the times hereinafter stated, namely: At Pendleton on the first Tuesday of April each year and at Medford on the first Tuesday of October each year.

SEC. 6. That the marshal and clerk of the district of Oregon shall each, respectively, appoint at least one deputy to reside in each of said towns of Pendleton and Medford, in said district of Oregon, and he shall maintain an office in each of said places.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the appointment of one additional district judge in and for the western district of Washington, and one additional district judge in and for the district of Oregon."

INDIANS OF FORT BERTHOLD RESERVATION.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the House be requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 8918) to provide for the payment to certain Indians of Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, in North Dakota, for certain horses condemned and destroyed by the Bureau of Animal Industry in the years 1906 and 1907. I will state that the same provision is in the Indian appropriation bill, which has passed the House and passed the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I enter a motion to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 27053) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that there may be printed in the RECORD, so that it will appear as a part of the proceedings in the consideration of this bill, the table showing the various changes in the course of the bill which the committee incorporated in its report.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the Senator wishes to have the report printed in the RECORD.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Not the entire report, but the table. I have no objection to the entire report being printed. I think perhaps it would be well that the entire report should be printed.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senator to make the request.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will make that request, that the entire report, which is not very long, but which contains some matters which I think might well be printed, may be printed in the RECORD in connection with the consideration of the bill and preliminary to it.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 1055, Sixtieth Congress, second session.]

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, submitted the following report to accompany H. R. 27053:

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 27053) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, having considered the same, report it back to the Senate with amendments:

The amount carried by this bill for the Department of Agriculture is	$13,773,276
The House bill carried for the same work	12,883,826
The actual increase by your committee over the amount as passed by the House is	889,450

The changes in the bill are as follows:

SECRETARY'S OFFICE.

The salary of the solicitor is advanced from $4,000 to $4,500. This increase is made for the purpose of making the salary of this official conform more nearly to the salaries paid to law officers in other departments. In no case does the law officer of any department, except the Department of Agriculture, receive a salary of less than $4,500 per annum. The salary of the stenographer and executive clerk to the Secretary of Agriculture is increased from $2,000 to $2,250. This employee has occupied this position for about eleven years, and the increasing extent and complication of the work of the Secretary's office would seem to entitle him to this small increase. His duties include not only stenographic dictation but much executive work besides. The salary of the inspector is advanced from $2,000 to $2,500. He is the only inspector attached to the office of the Secretary, and his duties are largely confidential in character and are performed under the personal supervision of the Secretary. They cover a very broad range and require great tact and fine judgment in addition to general ability and a knowledge of the work being carried on by all the bureaus and offices of the department. The increases in the salaries of the solicitor and the inspector were reported by the House committee, but went out on points of order on the floor of the House. The total increase for this office is $1,250.

WEATHER BUREAU.

The only increase in the appropriation for the Weather Bureau is in the salary of the chief of the bureau, which is advanced from $5,000 to $6,000. This has been done in order to make his salary equal to that of other government officials of the same rank. There is no other chief of a scientific bureau appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate who does not receive at least $6,000 per annum. This officer must direct the operations of his bureau every day in the year, including Sundays and holidays, until a late hour each night. The present chief of the Weather Bureau has served continuously in this bureau for the last thirty-two years, and during the last fourteen years as its chief. He has not received recognition by promotion for a number of years, although the metereological service of the United States, as administered by the Weather Bureau under his supervision, is believed to be the best in the world, and its high standing is due entirely to the good work of its present chief. The increase was reported by the House committee, but went out on a point of order on the floor of the House.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

There is an increase of $55,000 in this bureau for additional quarantine and inspection work. This amount was estimated for but was not reported by the House committee; however, it is believed to be absolutely necessary to meet the increased demands on the service along these lines and properly take care of the work.

BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY.

There is a total increase in the appropriation for this bureau of $156,090. Thirty thousand dollars of this sum is for promulgating the standards of the different grades of cotton in cooperation with associations, organizations, exchanges, and agricultural colleges; $22,560 for determining the grades and condition of grain offered for sale, and $103,530 for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil.

FOREST SERVICE.

There is an increase of $500,000 in the appropriation for this bureau, and is required to render more effective the proper protection of national forests from fire, and to further facilitate their use to the people.

BUREAU OF CHEMISTRY.

There is an increase of $15,000 in the appropriation for this bureau to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with the agricultural colleges for the purpose of demonstrating and illustrating the best methods of making denatured alcohol on a scale suitable for utilization by the farmer or associations of farmers.

BUREAU OF SOILS.

The only increase in the appropriation for this bureau is an advance of $200 in the salary of one photographer, whose work is of exceptional character.

BUREAU OF ENTOMOLOGY.

No change has been made in the appropriations for this bureau.

BUREAU OF BIOLOGICAL SURVEY.

There is an increase of $4,000 in the appropriation for this bureau for the maintenance of reservations for mammals and birds. This item was reported by the House committee, but went out on a point of order on the floor of the House.

DIVISION OF ACCOUNTS AND DISBURSEMENTS.

No change has been made in the appropriation for this division.

DIVISION OF PUBLICATIONS.

There is a net increase of $1,160 in salaries for this division, as follows: The salary of the foreman of miscellaneous distribution has been advanced $100; 1 forewoman has been advanced $200, and 1 clerk of class 2 and 1 skilled laborer at $900 have been added. One clerk at $720 and 1 skilled laborer at $720 have been dropped.

BUREAU OF STATISTICS.

No change has been made in the appropriation for this bureau.

LIBRARY.

No change has been made in the appropriation for the library.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES.

The appropriation for contingent expenses has not been changed.

OFFICE OF EXPERIMENT STATIONS.

The appropriation for this bureau has been increased $5,500. The salary of the director of the bureau has been increased $500 in recognition of his excellent services and careful supervision of the expenditure of large sums of money for the maintenance of agricultural experiment stations. Five thousand dollars has been added to the appropriation for nutrition investigations for investigating and reporting upon the best methods and appliances for the preparation of human food, with a view to securing useful information for distribution in the homes of the people.

OFFICE OF PUBLIC ROADS.

There is an increase of $20,250 in the appropriations for this office. The salary of the director of the office has been advanced $250, as he is an efficient officer and the important work of the bureau seems to warrant the small increase. It was reported by the House committee, but went out on a point of order on the floor of the House. Twenty thousand dollars has been added for ascertaining the relative effectiveness of township, county, and state systems of road administration, for making inquiries as to the cost thereof, and for reporting the results to Congress.

MISCELLANEOUS.

No change has been made in the amount of the appropriation for paper tests.

A provision has been inserted to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to inspect and control the importation of biological products to prevent a further outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease in this country, $25,000.

A provision has also been inserted to enable the Commission on Country Life, under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, to digest, compile, and publish the material already gathered by the commission, and to complete its work, $25,000.

A provision has also been inserted to create a commission on alcoholic liquor traffic, $80,000, of which sum $20,000 shall be immediately available.

Several other minor provisions have been inserted, but carry no appropriation of money.

The table following shows the various changes in the course of the bill:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, on page 1, line 8.

The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the head of "Department of Agriculture," on page 1, line 12, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred;" on page 2, line 5, before the word "dollars," to insert "two hundred and fifty;" and in line 10, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred," so as to read:

Office of the Secretary: Secretary of Agriculture, $12,000; Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $5,000; one solicitor, $4,500; chief clerk, $2,500, and $500 additional as custodian of buildings; private secretary to the Secretary of Agriculture, $2,500; stenographer and executive clerk to the Secretary of Agriculture, $2,250; private secretary to the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $1,600; stenographer to the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $1,400; one appointment clerk, $2,000; one chief of supply division, $2,000; one inspector, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 22, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seventy-three thousand three hundred and twenty" and insert "seventy-four thousand five hundred and seventy," so as to make the clause read:

Total for the office of Secretary, $174,570.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Weather Bureau," on page 3, line 25, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five" and insert "six," so as to read:

Salaries, office of Chief of Weather Bureau: One chief of bureau, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of salaries, office of Chief of Weather Bureau, on page 5, line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five," so as to read:

In all, $205,310.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Weather Bureau, $1,508,260.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Animal Industry," on page 11, line 9, before the word "thousand," to insert "and fifty-five," so as to make the clause read:

For inspection and quarantine work, including all necessary expenses for the eradication of scabies in sheep and cattle, the inspection of southern cattle, the supervision of the transportation of live stock and the inspection of vessels, the execution of the 28-hour law, the inspection and quarantine of imported animals, including the establishment and maintenance of quarantine stations and the construction and alteration of buildings thereon, the inspection work relative to the existence of contagious diseases and the tuberculin and mallein testing of animals, $655,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 1, before the word "bureau," to strike out "the" and insert "a;" and in line 2, after the word "station," to strike out "at Bethesda, Md.," so as to make the clause read:

For the purchase of additional land for a bureau experiment station, not to exceed $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 10, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty-eight" and insert "ninety-three," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $1,293,760.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 14, before the word "cooperation," to strike out "in" and insert "including," so as to make the clause read:

Cooperative experiments in animal feeding and breeding: For experiments in animal feeding and breeding, including cooperation with the state agricultural experiment stations, including the repairs and additions to and erection of buildings absolutely necessary to carry on the experiments, including rent, and the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all other necessary expenses, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 21, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "fifty-seven," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Animal Industry, $1,457,860.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Plant industry," on page 15, line 8, before the word "of," to strike out "life history" and insert "physiology," so as to make the clause read:

For investigating the physiology of crop plants and for testing and breeding varieties thereof, $27,290.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 13, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seventeen thousand seven hundred and twenty" and insert "twenty-five thousand and seventy," so as to make the clause read:

For soil bacteriology, plant nutrition, and water purification investigations, $25,070.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 14, before the word "investigations," to strike out "bionomic" and insert "acclimatization and adaptation," so as to make the clause read:

For acclimatization and adaptation investigations of cotton, corn, and other crops introduced from tropical regions, $17,990.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 18, before the word "investigations," to insert "and fermentation," so as to make the clause read:

For drug plant, poisonous plant, tea culture, and general physiological and fermentation investigations, $43,420.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 24, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twelve" and insert "forty-two," so as to read:

For investigating the handling, grading, and baling of cotton, and the establishment of standards for the different grades thereof, $42,250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 25, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That $30,000 of this sum, or so much thereof as is necessary, may be used by the Secretary of Agriculture in promulgating the standards for the different grades of cotton in cooperation with associations, organizations, exchanges, or agricultural colleges, such sets of standards as may be prepared by the department to be furnished at actual cost, the proceeds from the same to be turned into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I should like to have some explanation of that amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, that amendment relates to the standardization of the cotton of the South. It is carrying out what has been partially provided for heretofore. Perhaps the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] can give us some information upon the subject.

Mr. SIMMONS. What is the clause?

Mr. KEAN. It seems to be a proposition to standardize something or other.

Mr. WARREN. The item is at the bottom of page 15 and running over to the top of page 16, relating to the standardization of cotton, and $30,000 is appropriated for the purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly. I withhold the point of order.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from New Jersey that at the last session we passed an act providing for the standardization of cotton; that is, a small appropriation was made at that time. A commission was appointed to prepare the standards, nine in number, which reported, and the standards have been adopted. It is now necessary that all the cotton organizations of the country shall be provided with samples of these standards. The appropriation is for the purpose of purchasing cotton to be converted into the samples to supply the various cotton organizations and cotton buyers of the country. The money which will be received, a charge being made for each of these samples, will be restored to the Treasury. So this is only a temporary appropriation. The money will come back into the Treasury as soon as the samples are furnished.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I should like to have a few words read on that point from the evidence of Secretary Wilson, who was before the committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to the matter referred to going into the RECORD, but I shall make the point of order against the amendment if the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] does not.

Mr. WARREN. I trust the point of order may be withheld.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to the testimony going into the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested by the Senator from Wyoming.

The Secretary read as follows:

Secretary WILSON. A year ago, if you remember, Congress required us to grade cotton; and we got a committee of the most intelligent cotton men in the Southern States that we could find and had them come up. We got some men, also, from the boards of trade, and so forth, and they agreed on nine different grades of cotton. The proposition is to-day to enable us to furnish sets of standards, consisting of the nine grades.

Senator WARREN. For which you want $30,000.

Secretary WILSON. For which we want $30,000; and when they are sold the money is to be put back into the Treasury. The theory is that it is not going to cost the Government anything; but we want something to start on. That is what the theory is. We will make the standards and send them to every cotton-growing market, wherever they want them. We will send the sets, and they will pay for them, and we will put the money in the Treasury; but we have no money to go to work and do it now. That is the trouble.

Mr. WARREN. Now, Mr. President, only a word. The contention of the Secretary of Agriculture is that the law already provides for this work. The commission has done the work. This $30,000 is to provide for the printing, distribution, and sale, and from these sales it is expected the returns will not only pay for the issuance of the samples and printed matter, but also cover and reimburse this $30,000.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, this is another step in the direction of the Government of the United States attempting to fix standards for the sale of cotton all over the United States. First, we had an investigation, and now we have a promulgation of cotton standards. I can not see why the United States should be called upon to promulgate standards to take the place of the commercial standards that have been in use from time immemorial in connection with the sale of cotton. I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. BURKETT. Let me suggest that this does not appropriate any money. The Government is doing this thing. It just simply provides——

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Government is doing it, it is doing it contrary to law.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President——

Mr. BURKETT. The Government is doing it, and I do not see why it is not according to law.

Mr. BAILEY. Where is the statute that authorizes it?

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, this was authorized by the last appropriation bill reported from the Committee on Agriculture, and the Secretary of Agriculture has been at work. So far as I am concerned as a member of the committee, I care nothing about it, but there was a pressure from cotton men everywhere, and I want to say principally from New York, for a grading by the Government of cotton, so that there would be uniformity throughout the country. We passed that bill, and, as I have said, the Secretary of Agriculture has been at work under it. This proposition is intended to advance him $30,000 to furnish every little cotton market in the country with a set of these standards—9 grades. They are to repay it, and the money comes back to the Treasury. Not a cent is taken out of the Treasury except for a little while.

I want to say that the Secretary, not feeling competent, perhaps, with his force, unaccustomed most of them to cotton, called to his assistance the ablest cotton men whom he knew anything about in the cotton markets, as well as cotton raisers, and these men got together at their own expense and fixed the standards.

This provision is simply intended to send these standards to those who want them, and I know that applications for them are all the time coming from the different cotton markets. The Secretary sends them, and they pay him for them. He can not send them unless he has the money with which to do it, and they do not pay until they get them. It is simply a question of whether Congress will agree that that much public money shall be advanced for the dissemination of these standards to the different cotton markets of the country, the money to be returned immediately. That is the whole question. It does not cost anything, and unless this amendment shall be adopted, what we have done will be of no avail.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi if there is any attempt to establish these standards as legal standards?

Mr. MONEY. Oh, not at all.

Mr. BAILEY. I perfectly understand that the Federal Government has the right to establish the standard of weights and measures, but no other standards.

Mr. MONEY. No. This is just exactly like the grain standardization, which, as the Senator knows, we have provided for.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, Mr. President; and there is the trouble. The Government of the United States is being asked now to establish a standard for grain. We will next be asked to establish a standard for cotton; then a standard for cotton goods; then a standard for bread, and they have about established that in the pure-food law. The next thing will be a commission to establish a standard of liquor; and when we get through, Mr. President, the American people will be transacting their business under rules prescribed by commissions. There is hardly a general appropriation bill that comes to this body that either does not ask us to authorize the appointment of a commission or else authorize us to approve something that a commission has done, although the President has in some cases appointed the commission without the shadow of legal authority.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will my colleague on the committee yield to me until I have——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Until I can have read a clause of last year's law which authorizes this.

Mr. ALDRICH. I made the point of order against the amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. WARREN. I think, in justice to the committee, we ought to have the provision read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island insist upon his point of order?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield until this is read?

Mr. ALDRICH. Let it be printed in the RECORD. I have no objection to its being printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from Wyoming will be printed in the RECORD.

The clause referred to is as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish a standard for the different grades of cotton, calling to his assistance for that purpose expert cotton classifiers, by fixing a standard of middling cotton and, using the same as a basis, establishing a standard of nine different grades to be designated middling fair, strict good middling, good middling, strict middling, middling, strict low middling, low middling, strict good ordinary, and good ordinary, which shall be the official standard of cotton classifications. And the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to prepare in practical form the standard of said grades and furnish the same upon request to any person, the cost thereof to be paid, when delivered, by the person requesting the same, and certified under the signature of the said Secretary and the seal of his department.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is proposed that the Secretary of Agriculture may use this sum to promulgate standards. If we are going to establish standards of cotton to take the place of the commercial standards, let us do it in the ordinary way, by ordinary rules of legislation, and not upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, one word more.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island insist on his point of order?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do.

Mr. MONEY. I think this question is not very well understood. I appreciate the force of the remarks made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], because they are proper.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. MONEY. I yielded to the Senator from Rhode Island, and he has taken his seat, Mr. President. I suppose I can go on.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator can proceed by unanimous consent, but the point of order which the Senator from Rhode Island interposed before taking his seat made it necessary that the Chair should decide the question without debate or submit it to the Senate.

Mr. MONEY. I want to understand this.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Mississippi had the floor and yielded to me.

Mr. MONEY. I want to understand if I can be taken from the floor by the Senator making a point of order when I yielded to him, though I did not yield for such a purpose.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am quite willing to withhold the point of order until the Senator completes his remarks. I do not want to cut him off.

Mr. MONEY. I was going on to say, Mr. President, that I quite appreciated the force of the remarks of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. We are going right along, drifting pretty rapidly into a condition of things where the Government is going to take care of everything that the people ought to take care of themselves.

I want to say, as I said a while ago, that when this provision was passed by the committee I declined to favor it. I did not care anything about it. I did not see how it was going to do any good, and I did have some objection to its being done; but since the work has been done, as I have described, by disinterested men—by the cotton men of the country—I think the provision can do no harm. The Secretary has the standards, as ascertained by this commission. As I said, the work was done by men engaged in commercial lines. It was not done by a department or a bureau, but the standards were fixed by commercial men, by men who deal in cotton, who produce cotton, who sell cotton, and who buy cotton. The provision will enable the Secretary to distribute—"promulgate" is probably the wrong word—to distribute, to send anywhere, the nine samples on a card. That is all. The money is to be advanced for that purpose.

Now, if the amendment is to go out on a point of order, that is all right; but still the provision will not do any harm to anybody. If the idea is objected to, you should repeal the legislation of last year and not let the Secretary have the trouble of considering anything more about it. To withhold an appropriation, which is simply an advance for a short while, does not seem to me to be any particular economy.

I am perfectly willing to stop the standardizing of grain, the standardizing of cotton, and the standardizing of anything else into which the United States has to put its hand. I want to leave the people of this country to manage their business and their Government. I am not one of those who advocate that the Government shall take care of the people. On the contrary, if this is not a Government of, for, and by the people, we ought to have a constitutional convention called by the States, change the form of it, and have then a socialism, or a limited monarchy, or a constitutional monarchy, or a despotism, or anything else the people want. They have the right to change their form of government.

But I do not see that any harm can come by this trifling thing. If this point had been made last year, it would have been good. If it were made this year, against the standardizing of grain, I think it would be good; but it certainly would not be a good point if made against a provision that is to carry out a law of Congress that can not be carried out otherwise. In that view I do not see that the point of order is good, Mr. President, because certainly the Secretary has obeyed the law. He can not go a step further, and all that has been done will be useless unless this little advance is made. It is not very material to me. I can not see how it can be; but, at any rate, the cotton people think differently, and I have had a great many communications asking me to stand by this amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. I make the point of order against the amendment, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the point of order?

Mr. ALDRICH. That it is general legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is well taken, and sustains the point of order.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 16, after line 7, to strike out:

For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain, and the fixing of definite grades thereof, $52,440.

And insert:

For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain, and the fixing of definite grades thereof, $75,000: Provided, That whenever the Secretary of Agriculture is requested by any considerable number of grain growers in a community he shall appoint an expert grain grader for that community, whose duty it shall be to determine for those making proper requests the grades and condition of grain offered for sale and to collect from the seller of the grain such fees as may be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture, said fees to be used, first, for all expenses connected with the work, the remainder, if there be any, to be turned into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. KEAN. I make the point of order, Mr. President, that the amendment proposes general legislation.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator from New Jersey will withhold the point of order long enough to allow the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] to address himself to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey withhold the point of order?

Mr. KEAN. I withhold the point of order for a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey withholds the point of order.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, the proposed amendment is by no means in the same class with the amendment that has just gone out on a point of order. For three years past we have had a law directing the Secretary of Agriculture to fix standards of grain. This provision is merely to assist the Secretary in doing that which the law directs him to do.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I yield.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator if he will call attention to the statute to which he refers and read it, if he please.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Yes. In the last agricultural appropriation act there was contained a provision which was reenacted from a former appropriation bill. It is as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain, at such points as he may deem expedient, laboratories for the purpose of examining and reporting upon the nature, quality, and condition of any sample, parcel, or consignment of seed or grain, including rent and the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere; and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to report upon such samples, parcels, or consignments, from time to time, and the reports so made shall serve as a basis for the fixing of definite grades, and also for the issuance of certificates of inspection when requested by the consignor or consignee of any grain entering into foreign commerce.

That is the point.

Mr. FULTON. I call the Senator's attention to the fact——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield further to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I yield.

Mr. FULTON. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that that simply provides for the gathering of data upon which to base the fixing of a standard for grading. I do not know how that escaped me before. Had my attention been attracted to it I should have objected to it at the time the last agricultural appropriation bill was considered. I do not think it is a matter with which the Government has anything to do or in which is can act at all.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. This thing has been going on for three years or more. The Senator has been a Member of this body for longer than that time. If the Senator will examine the pending bill on page 16, he will find this language, which was framed, as I understand, in the office of the Secretary of Agriculture and predicated upon existing law:

For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain and the fixing of definite grades thereof—

"Grades," of course, are the same as standards. The proposed amendment does not fix the standard, but it enables the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out that which Congress has already directed him to do.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to state that the purpose of this amendment is simply this: I think it is the universal desire of the producers of grain that if there is going to be federal inspection of grain it shall be while the grain is the property of the producer. So I have drawn this amendment so as to provide that the Secretary may appoint a grading inspector in a given community when the producers ask him to do so, and that they shall pay the cost.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the point of order is not well taken in view of the fact that the amendment is simply to carry out existing law.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator if we enter upon this field of legislation, can not every other product, agricultural and manufacturing, within the whole boundaries of the United States claim that it is entitled to equal attention on the part of the Agricultural Department in the matter of inspection?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, to use a homely phrase, we will cross that bridge when we get to it.

Mr. BAILEY. But the trouble of it is that we are certain to get to it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That is probably so in certain respects.

Mr. BACON. I would say to the Senator that there are bills pending in Congress for the inspection of other products; and, if this one passes, it will be, of course, a good argument why the next one should pass, and when the next one passes it will be a good argument why all should pass.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, some of those bills may be very meritorious measures. I have not had the time to examine them all.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the senior Senator from North Dakota yield to the junior Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. There was an excellent provision in the House bill, which has been stricken out by the Senate committee and then reinstated as part of this amendment. The provision reads:

For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain, and the fixing of definite grades thereof, $52,440.

That provision is very good, so far as it goes. The Senate committee has added to that something that can be removed by a single objection, and I for one do not see any serious objection to its being removed. We have had before the Senate for some time, reported out of the Committee on Agriculture, a bill providing for federal grading of grain. It goes directly to the point. It provides for the grading to be done by the Federal Government, and the grades so established will be known as "national grades." We would reach it there directly.

This proposed amendment contains that which would be absolutely useless and which, if enacted into law, would simply set at naught the attempt to secure national grain grading. This provides, Mr. President, for an inspector to be appointed in any community where the producers may so desire. This is rather a large agricultural country, and perhaps every county in each State would be a community in which they would desire to have federal inspection.

Those who are opposed to federal inspection of grain, namely, the boards of trade that have been fattening upon the spoils that have been gained under the present system, have used more than any other argument the one that it would require a great army of inspectors. Under the provisions of this amendment it certainly would require an immense army of inspectors, and after you have your army and have made your inspection, it would not be worth anything, because the wheat will be bought and the grading will all again be done at the great terminals.

The wheat that is bought in great quantities is not bought by the farmer's load, one load at a time, but is bought by the thousands and hundreds of thousands of bushels. It is bought from the great grain centers, and fixing a standard there would, by reaction, fix the standard back on the farm. It is the only method we can reach whereby a standard good over the entire country can be established.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to say one word further, Mr. President, and that is in answer to the question of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. He asked why not have every other product standardized. The reason is that everything else is not sold by standards. Every fabric of cloth is not sold by a standard. There are comparatively very few articles that go into the commerce of the country that are sold by standard, but every bushel of grain in the United States has its value fixed according to the standard that is placed upon it, according to the inspection that is made of that grain. If it is made according to certain standards, and made——

Mr. BACON rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just one moment. If it is made by the purchaser and sold under a standard that is always fixed either directly or indirectly through the influence of the purchaser, the Senator can easily see that the producer is always at the mercy of the purchaser at the great terminal points in the fixing of those standards.

Mr. BACON. I recognize the strength of that suggestion, but I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that it may not be conclusive. For instance, woolen manufactured goods are not sold by a standard, but the fact that a thing is represented as woolen——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me for a moment. Let me finish the sentence. The fact that an article is represented as wool enables the seller to get a larger price than he could if it were known that it contained some cotton. If the principle contended for by the Senator as to wheat is correct, why should it not be extended so as to cover manufactured articles? Every article of goods represented to be woolen may be inspected to see whether or not it contains any threads of cotton. The same principle can be extended to almost every other article of manufacture or of agricultural product that one can name. The reason may be stronger in some cases than in others, but the principle will cover all, if it is adopted.

Mr. McCUMBER. The reason would be ten thousandfold stronger in the case of grains which are sold exclusively by grades, and which grades are fixed at the great terminals, than it would be as to other articles, of which perhaps there are thousands of grades, and which articles are not sold by standards.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I do not understand that the proposed amendment conflicts in the least with the bill which has already been reported from the Committee on Agriculture. There is nothing like it in the bill. The bill on the calendar does not provide for the grading in the local market place.

There is not such a wide difference between the views of my colleague and myself. My idea is we should fix the grade while the wheat belongs to the producer—the farmer—and allow the influence of that action to percolate into the markets of Chicago, Minneapolis, and Duluth, instead of fixing the grades in those great markets and allowing it to percolate back to the farm. That is the only difference.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the senior Senator from North Dakota yield to the junior Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. If we were to fix the standards while the grain is in the hands of the producer, we would be compelled to have an examiner at every elevator in the country to which the farmer ships his grain, and that would justify the complaint that is made by those who are opposed to federal inspection, that it would require an immense army of inspectors all over the United States. It is a physical impossibility to inspect all the grain raised in the United States while it is in the hands of the producer, and that I will not say is the vicious part of this provision, but it certainly is a very bad part of it, and it is not workable. If a grade was fixed upon the grain at the farm nobody at the great terminals would be bound by that grade, because the grain might be mixed in the elevator after it had passed out of the hands of the producer, and then it would be regraded at the great terminals just exactly as it is graded at the present time.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FULTON. I thought the Senator from North Dakota had concluded.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. No; but I will yield.

Mr. FULTON. I do not ask the Senator to yield. I thought he had concluded.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. In regard to binding anybody to the grade fixed by the Government of the United States, it is utterly impossible to do that. You can not compel a man to buy a thing unless he wants to. You can not compel a man to sell a thing unless he wants to sell, whether it is at the Duluth market or at the home market near the farm.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator said that no law could compel one man to buy from another. That is perfectly true, but it is not germane to this particular question. That might be said in opposition to the federal authority to establish a standard of weights and measures. You can not compel one man to buy cloth from another, but you can establish the rule that if he buys a yard of cloth he gets 36 inches. So you can not compel one man to buy wheat from another, but you attempt here to compel him, when he buys it, to accept a grading established by an expert appointed by the Agricultural Department.

The question I desire to ask the Senator from North Dakota is where the Congress of the United States obtains the authority to authorize the grading of wheat.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Senator has raised a great question, which I think we all understand. The Senator from Texas is better able to answer than I am, the Senator being a great constitutional lawyer.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the preceding paragraph. While we were discussing the mere question of appropriation a moment ago we overlooked the fact that the bill especially and distinctly provides for the establishment of standard grades of cotton. Let me read the Senator the very language:

> For investigating the handling, grading, and bailing of cotton, and the establishment of standards for the different grades thereof.

The English language could not make it possible to assert more distinctly the right and power of this Government to establish standard grades of cotton than this bill does; and instead of adopting the language we are now considering, I think we need to go back and strike out what the House has done. I mean no criticism of the committee, but the committee has reported the bill with the distinct assertion of federal power to establish the standard grades for cotton.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. If the theory of the Senator from Texas is correct that it is the duty of the Senate to retrace its steps, then we should go further back than the House at this session has gone, and strike out the law of a few years ago with respect to wheat. The Government of the United States has already entered upon this policy. There can be no denial of that.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from North Dakota permit me?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say to the Senator from Texas that the committee has not brought up this subject as new matter. The Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives last year provided in the appropriation act, with the President's approval, for this investigation of the grading and handling of cotton, and the appropriation which the committee has brought in here is to carry into effect and continue that which the Congress provided for a year ago.

Mr. BAILEY. I confess, Mr. President, that if a bill passed this body authorizing or recognizing the establishment of a standard grade of cotton by the Government of the United States it escaped my attention. I should have——

Mr. FULTON. I will state, if the Senator will allow me, that it provided only for the investigation, for gathering statements and statistics upon which at some later time the standard might be based.

Mr. BAILEY. If that was the language of the original act, that language has not been followed in this bill.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that I undertook to have the language read, and the Senator from Rhode Island, who then had the floor, refused to permit the reading and let it go into the RECORD. It is at the desk. It is the law of last year.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should be glad to hear it read. The progression of this matter seems to be somewhat wonderful, and I think it should be brought to the attention of the Senate. I should be glad to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. FULTON. I wish to make a correction. I stated to the Senator from Texas that the law of three years ago merely provided for the gathering of data. I had in mind the provision in reference to grain, but I see in regard to cotton the language is a little different.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator read it?

Mr. FULTON. It says:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish a standard for the different grades of cotton, calling to his assistance for that purpose expert cotton classifiers, by fixing a standard of middling cotton and, using the same as a basis, establishing a standard of nine different grades, to be designated middling fair, strict good middling, good middling, strict middling, middling, strict low middling, low middling, strict good ordinary, and good ordinary, which shall be the official standard of cotton classifications.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. Allow me just a word here. I wanted this read because I desire the Senator to turn his criticism upon those to whom it belongs rather than the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. I very cheerfully withdraw what I said in criticism of the committee, and I very candidly admit that this is the first time I have known that the American Congress had assumed the power to establish a standard grade for cotton. Of course, Mr. President, no Senator could possibly be familiar with all legislation, and I do not attempt to keep myself advised with respect to every appropriation bill. But I was delinquent with respect to this particular legislation, because it closely and deeply affects a commodity of which my constituents produce almost 30 per cent of all grown in the United States.

I do not know what their attitude about it would be—either those who grow the cotton or those who spin it—but I do know that whatever the argument might be in favor of it as a matter of policy or as a matter of material interest, it is clearly and indisputably beyond the power of Congress to pass any such law and give it effect in this Republic.

The Constitution of the United States gave us the power to establish standards of weights and measures, but there it stopped; and when we assume now to have the power to establish standards with respect to various commodities our power over all must be precisely as suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], the same as our power over any one.

The Senator from Georgia, however, will find that some enterprising people have anticipated his suggestion with respect to woolen goods. There have been bills introduced in this and in the other House to prohibit the shipment from State to State of cloth pretended to be wool when it contained any per cent of shoddy. They sought to do that, however, not under the assertion that Congress could classify merchandise, but under the general and broader power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations; and I undertake to say that this is the first time it has ever been seriously contended in either branch of Congress that we have the power, independently of our power over commerce, to establish classifications beyond that which the Constitution expressly gives.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, just a word before I take up that point for discussion. I will say we have already entered upon the policy to which the Senator objects.

In regard to the army of inspectors about which there seems to be some fear here, if the amendment becomes a law, I do not believe there would be an army of inspectors appointed. There will be some communities undoubtedly which would want a grain inspector appointed. There would be many other communities where no grain inspector would be needed. The very influence of the action of one inspector in a given community would be widespread as to many other communities in fixing grades; and the Secretary of Agriculture would be assisted in carrying out the law and the duty which Congress has already imposed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to answer two propositions—first, the one of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], asking where the authority for a law of this kind can be found in the Constitution. I will say frankly there is no authority for a law such as is proposed in this bill. I admit that. There is no pretension whatever that it is interstate commerce. I freely admit that Congress would have no authority to compel any farmer or any producer of grain to submit his grain for federal inspection. But this bill, even as proposed, does not go that far. It says they may, upon the request of the producers in any community, do so. Therefore there can be no conflict between the government officials and the party making the request.

Upon the other proposition, as to where the authority would lie, I will say that it would lie under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. I think every authority will bear me out on the proposition that the Government of the United States may make such rules and regulations in regard to any commodity that passes into interstate commerce as will prevent fraud being perpetrated by reason of the commerce in that commodity. The pure-food law was based upon the proposition that under our control over interstate commerce we could prohibit the shipment of any article entering into interstate commerce which was falsely branded or adulterated so as to deceive and defraud the purchaser.

Now, any bill for federal inspection that is based upon that theory, and that alone, that Congress has authority in the regulation of interstate commerce so to inspect the articles entering into that commerce as to prevent a fraud upon the public, is a valid constitutional enactment on the part of Congress; and if it is based upon and kept within those lines, I do not think there can be any serious objection to it. In other words, the rule will apply just the same to the grading of grain as it would apply to the matter of determining whether or not a certain article is misbranded or adulterated in any manner.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from North Dakota permit me?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the Senator states the rule too broadly. I think it is true that under the power to regulate commerce the General Government can exclude any article which in good conscience—I mean according to the conscience of the man who votes for the bill—might interfere with or interrupt or impede the commerce of the United States as among the States and with foreign nations. But the Senator does not contend that the Federal Government could go into a granary and classify grain before it becomes the subject of interstate commerce?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the very reason I say the provision in this bill can not find a constitutional warrant, because it seeks to do that before it becomes an article of interstate commerce, and we can only act upon it when it does become an article of interstate commerce. However, under the provisions of this bill, it is not mandatory, but permissible only, and in that respect, of course, there might not be any objection, except we could not enforce it.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the Senator will agree that what the United States has the power to do it can compel as well as permit. I think there can be no substantial difference between a law permitting and a law compelling a given course of conduct.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can make that clear. Take our provision for meat inspection. We can inspect meat only as it shall enter into interstate commerce. We have no authority, in my opinion, to enforce the inspection of meat before it is designed for interstate commerce. But we passed a law of that kind, and the packers were very glad to have all the meat inspected, whether it went into interstate commerce or not, and we are working, and working well, under that remarkable solution of the constitutional question.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not know that we have found a solution of it. My recollection of that law is that it provides for sending the inspectors into the packing houses, and I should like very much to see a case where an inspector was evicted, and have the question brought to the Supreme Court of the United States. I am perfectly confident that that great tribunal would say we had no power, because the product of the factory might subsequently become the subject of interstate commerce, to send an inspector into a factory of any kind.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator states the law as I also understand it, and therefore in the bill which we have before the Senate for federal grain inspection we do not attempt to exercise any authority over it until it enters into interstate commerce, and before it goes out of interstate commerce.

Mr. BAILEY. I will do the Senator the justice to say that I am satisfied any bill he has drawn obviates the constitutional difficulty so far as it can be obviated, and possibly when we come to examine his bill it is simply a question of policy as to whether it is wise or not.

Returning for a moment to the meat-inspection law, I suggested when that bill was pending here that if it provided that no meat should become the subject of interstate or foreign commerce unless it had been inspected it would be well within the constitutional power of Congress, and very probably, in order that they might export their meat, the packers would agree to have it all inspected. But my recollection is that my suggestion was not accepted, though I recall that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, the late Senator Proctor, assented to it; but I do not think the bill was conformed to my views, and I think when that question is brought into court it will be discovered that that law will not stand judicial scrutiny.

Mr. McCUMBER. In answer to the statement of the Senator from Texas, I believe if anyone were indicted for a refusal to allow an inspector in Chicago, for instance, to go in and inspect his meat, the indictment would be subject to demurrer. I do not believe we could enforce such a law. We are enforcing it because the packers are perfectly willing to have the law enforced as it now is.

Mr. BAILEY. In other words, we are practicing a kind of duress on them. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] tells me that the question has been decided, at least by one of the inferior tribunals, and he says it has been decided as the Senator and I agree it ought to be decided.

Mr. McCUMBER. But I do not contend, as the reason of my view, that because the old law is not wholly constitutional in all its provisions we can not say that meat shall be inspected so as to indicate what its qualities are before it passes into interstate commerce.

Mr. BAILEY. I will go further——

Mr. McCUMBER. I am very doubtful——

Mr. BAILEY (continuing). And say Congress can not before it enters into interstate commerce.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. I want to say I am very doubtful whether the Government could even lay its hand on it before it really enters into interstate commerce.

Mr. BAILEY. I am absolutely certain that is the case.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am very doubtful on that proposition.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to state one other proposition, and then I will yield, if it is agreeable to the Senator, or I will yield to him now if he desires.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota yields to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Maryland has sent for the case.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to speak about another proposition that was made by my colleague, in which he says that no law can compel anyone to purchase grain. I suppose he means by that, of course, the purchase of it under any given standard, but we will not have the slightest difficulty in that respect if we make our standards applicable at the great terminals. Why? Simply because all of the consumers desire a national standard, and they would not buy by any other standard if they could secure a national standard, because they have entire confidence in the national standard. And secondly, because every foreign purchaser, who has been demanding a national standard for years, is also in favor of purchasing entirely by such a standard; and inasmuch as you could secure no purchases by any other standard than the federal standard, there would not be the slightest difficulty, and it would in reality become the standard for all sales and purchases of grain.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will ask my colleague——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I simply desire to ask a question. Of course, my colleague has already stated that whatever the grain inspector might do at any point would not be mandatory. I think that would apply not only to the local market, where the wagonload of grain goes onto the elevator scales, but also at the great terminal elevators. I call my colleague's attention to that.

Mr. McCUMBER. It would not apply to the terminals for the reason I have just mentioned, and that is that the great consuming trade all over the country is demanding a federal standard, and not only is it demanded in this country, but the foreign demand is universal for a federal standard. Therefore they would make no contracts except for that standard. In other words, we would be furnishing them that which they are demanding.

Now, why would it not apply upon the farm? Suppose you had an inspector and that inspector passed upon a load of grain at an elevator, or 50 or a hundred loads of grain. They would be dumped upon the elevator; they would be mixed in the elevator. It is not interstate commerce in any degree. The purchaser can do with it what he has a mind to do and when it gets down to the terminal they will grade it themselves. The value that is fixed in the field of consumption by reaction always fixes the value in the field of production. The field of consumption would purchase under a national standard every time because we have government inspectors.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield further to his colleague?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. May I ask my colleague how he would fix the question of dockage? The great complaint at the local market place is that the buyer, the elevator man or the miller, gets the best of the producer on the question of dockage. The purchaser will say there is a wagonload of grain that contains 5 pounds of dirt to the bushel, and I will dock it 5 pounds to the bushel. The farmer has no redress whatever. I do not say that he would have much redress with a local federal inspector, but that local inspector certainly would be in a position to bring about better relations between the buyer and the seller. The dirt is taken out of the grain at the local elevator before the grain is shipped to the large terminal elevator, and it is the question of dockage concerning which our farmers are most impatient.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is very easily answered, Mr. President. The dockage is always fixed upon by certain rules and regulations at the terminals. There is the point where all the difficulty arises. The local buyer must always make as much dockage as he thinks will be allowed at the terminal; in other words, he must always make enough to protect himself.

Now, if we have government inspectors at the great terminals, and when a carload of grain goes there they determine what is a proper deduction for dockage, the purchaser from the farmer at the local elevator in making his next purchase can always make it in view of what has been held by the government inspector at the great terminal. That would not apply to the farmer's single load. As I have stated before, it would be impossible to have inspectors who would inspect every load of grain all over the United States as it goes into the local elevator.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I do not intend to enter into any constitutional discussion of this question, and I propose to refer to it only sufficiently to elucidate the point of order. Clearly, the proviso is both new legislation and general legislation. The proviso reads as follows:

Provided, That whenever the Secretary of Agriculture is requested by any considerable number of grain growers in a community he shall appoint an expert grain grader for that community, whose duty it shall be to determine for those making proper requests the grades and condition of grain offered for sale and to collect from the seller of the grain such fees as may be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture, etc.

Clearly, that is new legislation and general legislation. It would in practice amount to the appointment of grain inspectors in every rural community in the country where they were raising grain. In every county in my State they could petition the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint a grain inspector, and the grain would be inspected there, right at home. It is the grain growers, not the dealers in grain, who have the right to have these inspectors. Clearly it is subject to a point of order, and clearly, aside from that, it would not come within the constitutional authority of Congress to legislate in that direction.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I insist on my point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas rises to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Before the Senator proceeds, will he allow me just a minute to make an inquiry?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. In view of the decision of the Chair, are lines 8, 9, and 10, on page 16, the House provision, restored?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the entire amendment is indivisible and falls under the point of order. The effect of it is to restore lines 8, 9, and 10, proposed to be stricken out by the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. That was precisely the parliamentary inquiry that I desired to make, and if now is the proper time, I desire to move to strike out the House provision. If proper to make that motion now, I move to strike out lines 8, 9, and 10, on page 16.

Mr. KEAN. Let me call the attention of the Senator to lines 23, 24, and 25, which carry the appropriation.

Mr. BAILEY. That will be a separate amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas proposes an amendment, which will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out lines 8, 9, and 10, on page 16, in the following words:

For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain and the fixing of definite grades thereof, $52,440.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, let me understand the effect of that. The committee have stricken that out, and an agreement to the work of the committee effects exactly what the Senator from Texas moves. Do I understand the Chair has already ruled that the amendment of the Senate committee as to those three lines is disagreed to?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment was one to strike out and insert. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order was well taken, the effect of which is to strike out the matter in italics and to restore the three lines which appear in the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. WARREN. Then, of course, the motion of the Senator from Texas to strike out is in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the motion of the Senator from Texas is in order.

Mr. McCUMBER. I suppose the Senator from Texas desires to give his reasons for moving the amendment, and I desire to reply to them.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I have no desire to further occupy the time and attention of the Senate. I have stated what appears to me a controlling reason against legislation of this kind. We have now debated the matter for something like an hour, and unless something not yet suggested can be advanced in support of this provision I am ready for a vote upon my amendment to strike it out.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, let me say that the effect of the motion of the Senator from Texas, if it should prevail, would be to close up six or seven laboratories provided for two or three years ago.

Mr. BAILEY. There are 600 or 700 governmental establishments in this country that I should like to close up. They are altogether too numerous, and if we continue to multiply them the tax eaters will soon be as numerous as the taxpayers.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I might join the Senator when he furnishes me a list of the institutions that he desires to close. These laboratories are now in operation. The purpose of them is to ascertain the quality and character of grain for export. The Secretary of Agriculture, under a law passed three years ago, was authorized to give a certificate when it is requested by the exporter for a cargo of grain. We are already carrying on that work. We have a division in the Department of Agriculture devoted to the work provided for in the several bills, which have already become a law.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the mistake the department has made is that it has assumed a power that Congress could not vest in it; and I am inclined to believe it has anticipated that Congress would grant it a power it has not yet granted, and which I hope it never will grant.

The Senator from North Dakota illustrates one of the bad practices which prevail in all the departments. Every department under the Government is seeking an extension of its power. They make reports to Congress asking for appropriations to be used in a particular way, and, with the multitude of things which the Senate has to do and with the multitude of things which every Senator has to do, those recommendations escape us, just as it had escaped me that this important subject-matter had ever been dealt with after this fashion. Finally the department, having secured this permission and that extension of its power, finds itself assuming to do, even without a statute, what Congress has no power to authorize it to do by a statute.

I take it that if there is any embarrassment to the Secretary of Agriculture or to his department, it grows out of a greedy extension of his power.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The original law on this subject grew out of the solicitation of numerous organizations of people in the Northwest, where we produce large quantities of wheat, and it grew out of resolutions passed by legislatures of the various States in that section of the country. The Secretary of Agriculture had not asked for this legislation. The legislation was enacted by Congress in answer to the requests and petitions of the people from the Northwest country—the wheat-raising country. The Secretary of Agriculture is merely administering the law.

I say that the effect of the motion made by the Senator from Texas, if it should prevail, would be to wipe out a division of the Agricultural Department and put a stop to what I think is a very beneficial piece of work.

Mr. BAILEY. And if the motion does not prevail, the result will be to asssert a power in the Federal Government to fix the grading of grain without limiting it, as the Senator from North Dakota has expressed it, to the interstate handling of grain. There is no attempt here to distinguish between intrastate and interstate commerce.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Agricultural Department is not now interfering with grain that is for shipment within a State. I think it is only devoting itself to grain for exportation.

Mr. BAILEY. Fortunately they can not do it. I think they would if they could. I do not want to see Congress pass another law which even a minority of the Supreme Court could only sustain upon the ground that Congress did not mean what it said. They have recently held unconstitutional a law passed by Congress, because it used language broad enough to include intrastate as well as interstate transactions, and the minority of the court sought to save the law upon the ground that Congress did not intend to say what it said. That is not a very high compliment to our literary capacity or to our attention to these matters.

If his provision is to remain in the bill, surely it ought to be so framed as to be within the power of Congress, and as it stands it is not within our power. Therefore, Mr. President, I think it ought to go out of the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senate could give no harder or more disastrous blow to the entire farming interests of the Northwest than to vote in favor of striking out this provision from the bill. I know of what I speak in that respect. I represent solely an agricultural State. I have made a close and a most careful examination of the handling of our grain and of every law that has had a bearing upon the handling and buying and the selling of that grain.

Under the provision of law the Secretary of Agriculture has been making an investigation of the grades that have been given our grain. That very investigation has been worth millions and hundreds of millions of dollars to the farming community in the last five or six years. We are getting better grades today than we ever got before in the Northwest because we are awakening the interest not only of the farming community demanding that the old wrong shall be righted, but because through the activity and examination of the Agricultural Department of the different grain throughout the country that department is saying what grade such a grain is entitled to and its character and everything that bears upon the question of its value in the great markets of the world.

To-day American grain abroad is selling all over Europe for several cents a bushel less than any corresponding grade of the same grain shipped from any other country than the United States. The Secretary of Agriculture sent there during the past summer a special agent to investigate the question and to determine what difference there was between American grain of a certain character and Argentine, Canadian, and Russian grain of the same character and that would grade the same, and he found that there were several cents a bushel in favor of the grain produced anywhere else.

Now, why was this? The reason was that at every one, or nearly every one, of the great shipping points grain is mixed and graded from one to two higher grades than it is entitled to. In other words, the farmer's grain that is purchased is, we will say, good No. 2 northern. It is purchased for No. 3 northern instead of No. 2. That same No. 3 northern is mixed with other No. 3 northern, and at the great terminals it is put back to No. 1 and to No. 2 and sold in a foreign country under a higher standard than it was received under in this country. The result is that we have put in screenings and stuff in our outshipments that could not have found a market in the United States and certified them at a grade or two higher than they were entitled to have.

What is the immediate result of that? You, of course, impose upon the foreign purchaser for that one shipload, but when he makes the next purchase of grain he will only pay a No. 3 price for what purports to be a No. 1 grain, and as the price for No. 1 grain fixes the price of No. 1 grain at the points of production, you can easily see that the farmer who produces the grain receives a No. 3 price for a No. 1 grade, and that is why less is received for American grain of a certain standard than is received for the same grain when it is shipped from Canada, from the Argentine Republic, or from Russia.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I only desire to give the decision. I have sent out for the report, but it appears I can not get it at any place. I know the particular case. I was out of the Chamber when this discussion took place, and if the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] will permit me I will give the case according to my recollection, because I recollect it distinctly. It affects the constitutionality of this entire measure. It was the case of the United States against Boyer, and is reported in Eighty-fifth Federal Reporter. It is an opinion of Judge Rogers, of the Missouri district.

The question came up there, not incidentally or collaterally, but directly, whether the meat-inspection law was constitutional or unconstitutional, and it was held to be unconstitutional; and there has never been any reversal of that decision. I will give the case in a moment for the benefit of those who are interested in the constitutionality of this entire provision.

There was an attempt to bribe an inspector. There was a presentment and an indictment against the party who attempted to bribe him. There was a demurrer to the indictment, and the court sustained the demurrer upon the ground that the meat-inspection law was unconstitutional, and the whole law went by the board. The court held that we have no right for any purpose to send an inspector into a State for the purpose of inspecting meat, or inspecting grain, or inspecting anything else.

The decision, I submit to the Senator from North Dakota, is absolutely conclusive and final upon this proposition. If I could get the book, I would give you the decision, but it appears I can not get the report. It is the Boyer case, in Eighty-fifth Federal Reporter. There has been no reversal of it. There was no appeal taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, because the United States did not have the right of appeal. That case stands to-day unreversed by any decision, so far as I can find in the reports of the Supreme Court.

Any law that permits the Secretary of Agriculture, or any other officer of the Government, to send an inspector into a State for the purpose of inspecting meat or grain or any other article of commerce before it leaves that State, I submit, under that decision and under any number of other decisions, is an unconstitutional law.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is not any question about the rightfulness of that decision; I have never questioned it at all; but it has not the slightest application to this provision. It did have an application to the provision which has gone out on a point of order; I will admit that; but it has nothing to do with the provision that we are speaking of now.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator from North Dakota contend that the language now under discussion limits the power to fix these grades to interstate-commerce transactions?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will just read what it says and give the Senator my construction of it.

For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain, and the fixing of definite grades thereof.

There is not any question but what the Agricultural Department can investigate the handling of grain. They can make any investigation that they see fit as to how the grain is handled and can report to Congress anything that they think will be of importance to us to know. So far there can be no objection. Neither can there be any question with reference to the department itself fixing what it would call "proper grades." There is nothing in the provision which attempts to force those grades into the business of the country and to compel dealers to buy and sell by those grades. If that was there, if it was the construction that we were to follow the grades, that any standard fixed by the Agricultural Department should be the grades under which the grain should be bought and sold, there would be no question whatever, in my mind at least, but that it would be unconstitutional. But that is not the intention at all.

Now, we have been appropriating, year after year——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. McCUMBER. In just one minute. We have been appropriating money, year after year, for the investigation of the boll weevil and other matters affecting the cotton crop. We could not go to your farm and compel you to hand over any of that crop for investigation. It is not necessary. The work of the department upon the cotton crop, I believe, has been extremely beneficial to the cotton growers of the United States. I believe the work that has been done is beneficial, in reference to the grading of cotton, so that the dealers over the country can see what would be a proper grade and what cotton ought to measure up to a particular grade. It may be that they have made more grades and finer distinctions than are necessary, but I believe that the work is absolutely in the right line and is doing good.

The effect of the work of these laboratories in determining the character of grain raised in any particular section of the country and their work in determining whether a certain grade that has been given by the department in any section of the country is a fair grade has been beneficial. Let me give the Senator an example right here. I had some grain sent to me a short time ago which had been inspected at one of the great terminal markets and was given a certain grade, according to the rules of that terminal governing the grading of grain. The Agricultural Department took up the same grain, applied the same rules, and ascertained that the terminal inspection was far below what the grade should have been by the rules of that terminal.

When this became generally known, the terminal inspectors themselves became far more careful in making those grades, because they knew when the farmer shipped a carload of grain to any of the great terminals he could take a sack of that grain from the car, send it down here, and have it examined, not according to the standard in the department, but according to the standard of the terminal where the grain is to be sold. If he finds that he is not getting a fair grade, if he has had notice of that fact, he gives that notice to others, and those who are buying his grain at that terminal will be far more careful in giving it an honest and just grade. This is of inestimable value to the entire grain-raising section of the Northwest, and this little amount of some fifty-odd thousand dollars should not be interfered with.

I shall be ready, Mr. President, to take up the question of the advisability of federal grain grading and inspection when we reach it upon a bill which is before the Senate, which bill is so drawn that it will, in my opinion, stand every constitutional objection.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I simply wanted, if possible, to call the Senator back to the point at issue. He exhibits the debater's skill in running away from a question which it is difficult to answer. I asked the Senator the flat question if he did not believe that that language appearing in this bill is broad enough to include intrastate as well as interstate transactions?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think that intrastate or interstate transactions have the slightest thing to do with it, but that it is simply for the information of the department itself that makes these examinations.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator has just illustrated how the ruling of the department governs men, and thus negatives his statement that this is a harmless order promulgated by the department.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not said that it was harmless. I have said that it was very beneficial.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senator uses the word in one sense when I use it in another.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not use the word "harmless" at all.

Mr. BAILEY. I use the word "harmless" with reference to the power; the Senator uses it with reference to the prosperity of his section of the country.

I am very free to say, Mr. President, that I have never been able to bring myself to believe that you could promote the real prosperity of this country by violating the Constitution of this Republic or by embarking the Government upon a domain which ought to be reserved for individual or corporate enterprise.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator right there, Does he believe that we violate the Constitution in providing money that the Secretary of Agriculture may use in investigating the boll weevil?

Mr. BAILEY. Or the foot-and-mouth disease, or such as that. That is a close question. In those cases only a naked power of appropriation is exercised; and I have no hesitation in saying that Congress can not couple the exercise of a substantive power with those appropriations. Congress may appropriate the money to study the nature and habits of cotton pests, but it can not send its agents into my field for that purpose if I am not willing for it to do so. Congress may appropriate thousands to stop the spread of the foot-and-mouth disease, but the Federal Government can not enter my farm to inspect or destroy one of my cattle infected with the foot-and-mouth disease if I protested against their coming. In other words, I contend that the Federal Government, at most, in cases like these can have and can exercise only the naked power of appropriation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me a suggestion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was attracted by the Senator's observation as to the authority of the agents of the Agricultural Department invading a State in connection with the foot-and-mouth disease. The farmers of New England—at least of New Hampshire—did protest against such agents exercising the right to slaughter herds, and, as the farmers said, without much regard to whether the cattle had the disease or not, but the agents proceeded to do it, and the cattle were killed under that authority.

Mr. BAILEY. That only illustrates, Mr. President, the gradual encroachment of the General Government on the State and the gradual encroachment of the state government upon the individual.

I myself believe that the individual welfare of every man should yield to the higher welfare of all men; but it ought to be only in clearly defined cases. If we concede from time to time the power of the Government, through its majority, to prescribe the conduct and management of the minority's business, I wonder where the end will be. If one year we recognize the Government's right to prescribe a standard for grain, the next year a standard for cotton, and the third year a standard for cloth, what is to be left to the merchants and the consumers of this country? Are we to be compelled to buy and sell according to the direction of the statute, or are we to be permitted, as our fathers were permitted, to buy and sell according to our common sense and according to our own best judgment? Sir, this is what I protest against here and now, and what I have been vainly protesting against ever since I have had the honor of occupying a seat in the Congress—the gradual encroachment of the Government upon the man.

I believe that the true progress of civilization is one under which the man needs to be less governed; but under our theory, or at least under our practice, we are telling the world that the more enlightened our Nation becomes, the more our people become educated, the less they are able to take care of themselves and the more they are compelled to depend upon the Government to take care of them.

Mr. President, in one of the most excellent commentaries ever written upon our institutions it was said that the weak place in this Government is the relation between the majority and the minority. When I first read that I felt that it was the most foolish of all the comments upon our system, but time and circumstances and experience have convinced me that the author of that remarkable book was wiser than any man of his day or generation.

I felt then, without experience, that the limitations of a written constitution would always suffice to protect the minority in all of its essential rights against the aggressions of the majority; but no man can read the history of our legislation for the last thirty years without becoming convinced that the Frenchman spoke the truth when he said that the most difficult problem under this system of government is how to protect the minority against the majority.

Some things the majority have a right to prescribe for the minority. They have a right to prescribe its conduct so far as it affects the public peace and the public order and the public health; but they have no right to prescribe the rule of purely private transactions. If my neighbor can out-trade me, that is his good luck and my bad fortune, and I would rather suffer in the transaction where his better judgment gives him the advantage than to be continually invoking the Government to stand an officer at my side and prevent the brighter man from making the better trade.

We want a statute now, Mr. President, to govern us in everything. If a man makes a mistake, he does not go and in the quiet of his office, or in a conference with his friends, admit the mistake, and resolve to be more cautious thereafter; but he wants a law to fix it so that he can not make the next mistake.

When I was a boy I sometimes stubbed my toe; and when I did, I went crying to my father. He was a wise man of the old school, and so he laid his hand on my head and said: "My boy, next time you look where you are going and you will not stub your toe." I obeyed that good advice, and I became more careful where I ran and where I played; but in this day, if a boy stubs his toe and goes crying home the modern father does not admonish him to be more careful, but tells him that he will go to Congress and have a law passed to dig up the stump so that he can not "stub his toe." [Laughter.]

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator in his oratory has drifted somewhat away from the particular matter under consideration. I think, however, I can answer one or two of his propositions. He asks, if we have a standardization of grain, if we have a standardization of cotton, why not have a standardization of woolen goods and everything of that character, and where shall we stop? I will simply say to the Senator that so long as we are capable of self-government the people themselves will probably determine the proper place to stop. There will be wisdom in the world when the Senator and when I are entirely out of it, and enough wisdom in this Government, probably, to still run it properly and make a proper division between the rights of the people themselves to do their business in their own way and the right of the Government to determine how they shall do it. I believe the very best thing for the Congress of the United States to do under the present conditions in this Government, which are not the conditions of our forefathers, is that Congress shall exercise its authority to the limit and do what it has a right to do as the Congress of the United States, and then allow the State to exercise its authority up to its limit. Then you will have a proper law governing every condition.

I will take the Senator's illustration of stubbing his own toe, and we shall see where he would be landed according to his own view. If there were thorns in the path he was about to travel, he would say that he must always keep away from that path. But that path was intended for travel, and if there is not a power at his own home to remove those thorns, there ought to be power lodged somewhere to do it.

Now, let us take the matter of selling grain and let us see if the Senator's proposition is true, that one man should always be placed at the mercy of another in a trade, or what the Senator calls "out-trading each other." That is true when a suit of clothes is sold to an individual. He can look at those clothes; he can examine them; he can refuse them; and he can go to the next store and buy there if the other does not suit him, or if the price of the clothes does not suit him. But when I raise a carload of grain in my State and send it to Chicago, I am not meeting the man who is purchasing that grain; we are not meeting face to face by any means, and I am totally at his mercy if authority is solely given to him to fix the grade under which that grain is to be sold.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. That grain, when it left my home, was good No. 2 northern wheat, I will say, and when it arrived in the city of Chicago it was good No. 2 northern; but the man who buys that wheat appoints his own inspector, who grades it as No. 3. Under a combination between that purchaser and every other purchaser they govern the entire number of inspectors, and they buy all the grain at a lower grade than what it really is.

If there was nothing but the view of the article to be considered, and it was sold to a man who could see it and buy it upon its actual condition, then the proposition of the Senator would be applicable, at least to some extent; but the grain is sold not by the carload lot alone in these great centers, but in the great elevators, by millions of bushels at a time. Its value is not the value of the grain, but the value of the grade that is put upon that grain. As the producer has no voice whatever in the establishing of the grade, as he can not reach it in any other way, then there ought to be lodged in the Government somewhere a power that will provide for an honest grading and an honest inspection.

When our forefathers adopted the Constitution of the United States they foresaw that the products of one State would necessarily find a market in another State; and in order that the products of one State might not be excluded by the exercise of the sovereignty of another State by throwing about it such rules and regulations as would infringe upon or destroy its value, they provided that the Congress should have control over interstate commerce. So long as this grain is interstate commerce, I claim it is the duty of Congress, under these peculiar conditions, to exercise congressional authority. Why? Simply because we can not get relief in any other way than through the power that is vested in Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from North Dakota permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I understood the Senator to say that the farmers sold their grain in Chicago. My understanding has always been that the farmers sold it in their immediate market and that those who purchased it there shipped it to Chicago or shipped it abroad. I know that in the case of cotton—and my experience with that product is larger than it is with grain—the farmer who grows it sells it at his market town, and the people who buy it there ship it to the factories of this country or to factories abroad.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is both right and wrong.

Mr. BAILEY. The farmer, of course, in the case of cotton, would have no governmental help to classify or standardize it, and if the course of dealing in grain is the same as in cotton, then the farmer of Dakota who sells his grain to a dealer who in turn ships it to Chicago would not even be the beneficiary of the law, even if the law is beneficial from a financial point of view.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is entirely mistaken in his proposition, or, rather, he is partially mistaken as to the general rule in regard to the sale of grain, and entirely mistaken with reference to his conclusion as to whether or not the farmer would be benefited.

In the first instance, let me say to the Senator, especially in my State, where we have very large farms, very much of the grain is shipped out directly from the farms in carload lots to the great terminals, Chicago, Minneapolis, Duluth, and Superior.

Mr. BAILEY. That is the case with the large farmer. How is it with the small farmer?

Mr. McCUMBER. They are all pretty large farmers there. We do not have very many of what might be called "small farmers." They might all be called "large farmers" in that section of the country.

Mr. BAILEY. They ought to be able to take care of themselves, then, without the help of the Government.

Mr. McCUMBER. They are farming all the way from 600 to 6,000 acres each.

COMPANIES B, C, AND D, TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Senate will proceed, under the unanimous-consent agreement, to vote upon Senate bill 5729 and amendments pending and to be offered.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (S. 5729) to correct the records and authorize the reenlistment of certain noncommissioned officers and enlisted men belonging to Companies B, C, and D of the Twenty-fifth U. S. Infantry who were discharged without honor under Special Orders, No. 266, War Department, November 9, 1906, and the restoration to them of all rights of which they have been deprived on account thereof.

Mr. WARREN. I ask permission to say that I shall endeavor to have the agricultural appropriation bill taken up and its consideration continued on to-morrow morning, immediately after the routine morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], to strike out section 2.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, in order that we may vote intelligently, it will be necessary that the bill should be read as well as the amendment. I have no doubt they have been read heretofore, but many of us are not familiar with them, and I desire to have the bill read.

Mr. FORAKER. The original bill was read, and the amendment, which was offered as a substitute and adopted, was also read at the time that it was agreed upon, so that I suppose the call of the Senator from Georgia has reference only to the substitute.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the order of the Senate the substitute is the bill before the Senate. Does the Senator from Georgia desire that the substitute be again read to the Senate?

Mr. BACON. If I am to vote upon it, I certainly do, because I do not know what it is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the substitute bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to appoint a court of inquiry, to consist of five officers of the United States Army, not below the rank of colonel, which court shall be authorized to hear and report upon all charges and testimony relating to the shooting affray which took place at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906. Said court shall, within one year from the date of its appointment, make a final report, and from time to time shall make partial reports, to the Secretary of War of the results of such inquiry, and such soldiers and noncommissioned officers of Companies B, C, and D of the Twenty-fifth Regiment U. S. Infantry who were discharged from the military service as members of said regiment under the provisions of Special Orders, No. 266, dated at the War Department the 9th day of November, 1906, as said court shall find and report as qualified for reenlistment in the Army of the United States shall thereby become eligible for reenlistment.

SEC. 2. That any noncommissioned officer or private who shall be made eligible for reenlistment under the provisions of the preceding section shall, if reenlisted, be considered to have reenlisted immediately after his discharge under the provisions of the special order hereinbefore cited, and to be entitled, from the date of his discharge under said special order, to the pay, allowances, and other rights and benefits that he would have been entitled to receive according to his rank from said date of discharge as if he had been honorably discharged under the provisions of said special order and had reenlisted immediately.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], to strike out section 2 of the bill. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" have it.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when Mr. BURNHAM's name was called). My colleague [Mr. BURNHAM] is unavoidably absent from the city. He instructed me to say that if present he would vote in favor of this bill. I learn that the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] is likewise absent, and that he would vote against the bill, so I will ask that my colleague and the junior Senator from Illinois be paired on this question.

Mr. FLINT (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FULTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. Were he present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] who is absent, thus leaving the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] and myself free to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO]. As he is not present, I will withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I want to explain, if I may be permitted to do so, why I shall vote the way I do on this proposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. TILLMAN. Can I do it now?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is no objection——

Several SENATORS. Let the vote proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I will vote "yea," and will explain my vote later.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FULTON. Under the transfer of pairs made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], I am at liberty to vote, as I understand. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMOOT. My colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 56, as follows:

YEAS—27.

Bacon	Frazier	Martin	Rayner
Bailey	Gary	Milton	Simmons
Bankhead	Gore	Money	Smith, Md.
Clarke, Ark.	Johnston	Newlands	Stone
Clay	McCreary	Overman	Taylor
Daniel	McEnery	Owen	Tillman
Foster	McLaurin	Paynter

NAYS—56.

Aldrich	Cullom	Gamble	Nixon
Beveridge	Cummins	Guggenheim	Page
Borah	Curtis	Hale	Penrose
Bourne	Depew	Hansbrough	Perkins
Brandegee	Dick	Hemenway	Piles

Clark, Wyo.	Fulton	McCumber	Warren
Crane	Gallinger	Nelson	Wetmore

NOT VOTING—9.

Ankeny	Davis	Hopkins	Sutherland
Burnham	Flint	Scott	Taliaferro
Culberson

So Mr. DANIEL's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, it will be recalled that when the Brownsville matter first came into the Senate I took the position that the President had no authority——

Mr. ALDRICH. I dislike to call attention to the fact that under the unanimous-consent agreement there is to be no discussion. The Senator may make his explanation after the vote has been taken. I dislike to call attention to the fact, but it is a dangerous precedent to establish, to permit any discussion when, by unanimous consent, we are to take a vote without debate.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not making any discussion.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is equivalent to that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am merely trying to give the reason for my vote. Of course, if the Senate will not give me permission to explain my vote, I can not help myself.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, nothing is in order except to vote.

Mr. TILLMAN. Am I permitted, under the ruling of the Chair, to make an explanation now or not?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that if there is objection that can not be done.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course I have to yield.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. FORAKER. I ask for a yea-and-nay vote.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when Mr. BURNHAM's name was called). I again announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. BURNHAM] with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BAILEY (when Mr. CULBERSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] is unavoidably absent. If he were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. FLINT (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. If he were present and voting, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FULTON (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS], but subject to the approval of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who is temporarily absent from the Chamber and who is paired with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SCOTT (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO]. If he were present, I should certainly vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FULTON (after having voted in the affirmative). I understand that the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], to whom I transferred my pair, has already been paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM]. I understand, also, that he is opposed to the measure. Therefore I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 56, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—56.

Aldrich	Cullom	Guggenheim	Page
Beveridge	Cummins	Hale	Penrose
Borah	Curtis	Hansbrough	Perkins

Culberson	Fulton	Scott

So the bill was passed.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I wish briefly to explain my vote on this bill.

When the Brownsville matter was first brought into the Senate I took the position, I believe alone among Democrats, that the President was not warranted in his action; that his dismissal of the troops under the conditions and circumstances was cruel and contrary to all ideas of justice which I had ever read about or thought about. The majority of the Senate then took a contrary position and sustained him. The Senate to-day has reversed and stultified itself and emphatically condemned his action by the step which it has just taken, which permits all of these troops to be reenlisted under certain conditions—guilty and innocent alike.

My position then was that the President ought not to have dismissed and punished innocent men because some men were guilty. We have to-day illustrated what used to be called on the Scotch border "Jedwood justice." When the lords of the marches caught some man who might have been suspected of stealing cattle or committing some other offense, they would hang him first and then try him afterwards. These negroes have been "hanged," so far as the President could do it, and now the Senate proposes to give them a trial and a tardy justice to those who may be able to prove their innocence, although I doubt if any can prove it. But it is a cardinal legal principle that a man must be considered innocent until he is proved guilty, and proving a negative is an impossibility. But my attitude is that somebody shot up Brownsville, and I believe some of the negroes did it, but not more than 25 of them were ever charged with it, while 168 were discharged. Now, to turn the whole bunch back into the army, as they doubtless will be, will be to admit into the service of the United States some men who have committed murder, for there is no doubt in my mind that you will never be able to find out who committed this crime. Therefore, as I did not want innocent men to be kicked out of the army, I do not want any guilty men to get back into the army, and so I voted "nay" on this proposition.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 26203) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. BURNHAM, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. TAYLOR as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RESURVEY OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24835) authorizing the necessary resurvey of public lands, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and accede to the request for a conference, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Vice-President.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. SMOOT, Mr. FLINT, and Mr. BANKHEAD.

PENSIONS AND INCREASES OF PENSIONS.

Mr. HALE. I desire to move that the Senate adjourn, but I will withhold the motion for a moment because the Senator from North Dakota wishes to prefer a request.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected pension bills on the calendar, and that no other business be conducted by the Senate during this legislative day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected pension bills on the calendar, and that no other business be considered during the remainder of to-day's session. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will state the first bill in order.

The bill (S. 9278) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to certain dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pension the following persons at the rate per month stated:

Thomas H. Reynolds, late major, Thirty-second Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry.

Perry Duncan, late of Company G, Sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain, $10.

Anna Sterr, dependent mother of Frank Sterr, late of Company I, Fifth Regiment U. S. Cavalry, war with Spain, $12.

John W. Ragan, late of Captain Tatom's company, Tennessee Volunteers, Florida Indian war, $16.

Mr. DANIEL. I move to insert at the end of the bill the words:

The name of Ellen Bernard Lee, widow of Fitzhugh Lee, late brigadier-general, United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

I will state in this connection that a bill has passed the Senate at the present Congress for this purpose, and I have no doubt the amendment will have the assent of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will ask the Senator if that is the rate fixed by the Senate when it passed the bill for this purpose?

Mr. DANIEL. It is.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

John A. Browne, late of Thirty-sixth and Fourth Companies, U. S. Coast Artillery, $30.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (H. R. 26072) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This completes the Pension Calendar up to to-day.

Mr. McCUMBER. I believe that is all, Mr. President.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 24, 1909, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 23, 1909.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., delivered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee from our heart of hearts for the safe return of our naval fleet from its long voyage around the world. And we most fervently pray that it may serve to strengthen the ties of friendship and brotherly love between us and the nations at whose ports it touched; that the time may speedily come when these grim defenders of our rights and liberties shall be no longer needed, and that all state, national, and international problems shall be settled by the saner methods of arbitration; that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. To a question of the highest privilege, Mr. Speaker. I desire to ask if the Clerk will read the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida claims the floor on a question of the highest privilege.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk will read the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas on the 26th day of January, A. D. 1909, this House of Representatives being there in session at the Capitol, and having under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union H. R. 26305, in "general debate," the Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, a Representative in the Congress of the United States from the State of Illinois, then and there delivered from his place on the floor of the House an address in which he discussed the manner in which the Government of the United States acquired rights on the Isthmus of Panama, with relation to the proposed canal across said Isthmus; the manner of consummating the contract for the purchase of the canal property; the conduct of certain persons, official and nonofficial, connected therewith; and the general subject of the acquirement, construction, and management of the said Panama Canal, as well as the acts and doings of the said persons in and about the same; and

Whereas on the 29th day of January, A. D. 1909, in the open session of the House of Representatives, the same being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration in "general debate" H. R. 26915, the said the Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, a Representative as aforesaid, again further addressed the House in Committee of the Whole as stated, on the subject aforesaid, and in continuation of his address so delivered as aforesaid on the said 26th day of January, A. D. 1909; and

Whereas on the 9th day of February, A. D. 1909, the Hon. Robert Bacon, Secretary of State of the United States, caused to be composed, written, printed, and published in certain and numerous newspapers, which are published in the city of Washington and elsewhere throughout the United States, and which are of general circulation in the United States and elsewhere, as well as making the same by filing therein a part of the permanent records of the State Department of the United States, a certain document alleged to be in reply to a communication said to have been received by him, the said Hon. Robert Bacon, Secretary of State as aforesaid, and to have been written by some official of the Government of the Republic of Panama, taking exception to and complaining of the said addresses of the said Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, a Representative as aforesaid, in behalf of his Government, the said Republic of Panama, and which said document so composed and published by the said the Hon. Robert Bacon, Secretary of State as aforesaid, as the same was published and appeared in the Washington Post, a daily newspaper published at the city of Washington, D. C., in its issue of the 10th day of February, A. D. 1909, and which said newspaper has and enjoys a wide circulation throughout the United States, was and is as follows, viz:

"SIR: The President directs me to say in answer to your communication of February 9, 1909, that the remarks complained of were made in the House of Representatives. Under our Constitution we have, for what we regard as wise reasons, provided that for any speech or debate in either House they (the Senators and Representatives) shall not be questioned in any other place.

"This provision we regard as essential to secure full liberty of speech to the elected representatives of the people; and we feel that such liberty of speech should be preserved even though it may occasionally be abused.

"It ought to be understood that the utterances of individual Members are not to be taken as expressing the views either of the Government of the United States or the House in which such remarks are made. As regards the statement in question made by Representative RAINEY, the President attached so little importance to him that he had not even read them until your protest came. He has now read them, and none of them concerning which he has knowledge have any foundation in fact.

"The President wishes me to recall to your attention that the attack was made even more upon Americans, including the President-elect, than upon the officials of Panama. The President need hardly say that this Government disavows all responsibility for the remarks of Representative RAINEY, to which you refer.

"Accept, sire, the renewed assurance of my high consideration.

"ROBERT BACON."

Now, therefore, be it resolved:

First. That the matter of the said communication of the said the Hon. Robert Bacon, Secretary of State of the United States, to the said official of the Government of the Republic of Panama and all matters connected therewith, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives for the careful consideration of the said committee to determine:

(1) If the said communication of the said Hon. Robert Bacon, Secretary of State as aforesaid, constitutes a breach of the privileges of a Member of the House and of the House, violating either in letter or spirit section 6 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, wherein it is provided that a Representative in Congress "shall not be questioned in any other place" for "any speech or debate" in the House.

(2) If there has been such violation, what remedy, if any, exists.

(3) If there has been such violation and it is found that no remedy exists, to suggest some plan to prevent such violations and to punish them in the future.

Second. That the said Committee on the Judiciary make full report herein to the House of Representatives within five days from the reference to said committee of this resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask——

Mr. PAYNE. How does this matter come before the House?

The SPEAKER. It comes before the House on an alleged question of highest privilege.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I make the point of order against it.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that it be laid on the table.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have been on my feet all the time. I offered——

The SPEAKER. Precisely.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I offered the resolution, and I want to address myself to it for a few moments.

The SPEAKER. Precisely. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order, and the Chair will ascertain what the point of order is.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then I want to address myself to the point of order.

The SPEAKER. That is in the discretion of the Chair, after the gentleman has made it, if the Chair desires to hear any argument on the point of order. But the Chair must first ascertain what the point of order is. The Chair is not advised.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Very well.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I make the point of order that the resolution is not of the privileged character indicated by the gentleman.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. I make the point of order that we can not hear.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The gentleman from Indiana will state his point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I make the point of order that the reading of the paper at the Clerk's desk does not disclose that degree of privilege which would entitle the gentleman to bring the subject-matter before the House as one of the highest privilege. I do not think that a quotation from a newspaper would be sufficient to justify this House in recognizing that as of a sufficient degree of privilege to warrant this House in sending it to any committee of the House or to make the character of investigation which the gentleman undoubtedly has intended to pursue.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman give way to a question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRAN. Do I understand the gentleman to question the privileged character of the resolution?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do.

Mr. COCKRAN. On account of its being based on a quotation from a newspaper?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, no.

Mr. COCKRAN. Pardon me until I conclude. Or does he question the right to challenge by resolution as a breach of our privileges the fact that the Secretary of State by direction of the President has undertaken to characterize the action of a Member of the House?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I did not intend to discuss the facts. I think that a sufficient answer is that as it is presented it is deprived of its privilege. I think that the entire paper as filed does not disclose a question of privilege.

Mr. COCKRAN. Just a word. Do you claim it is not a privileged matter to question the right of an executive officer to debate in correspondence with a foreign government what is said in this House, or do you make the point of order that this particular resolution now before the House is lacking in proof of the subject-matter about which it seeks to have action taken?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to rule. But if the gentleman desires to speak upon the point of order——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would like to have a moment or two, Mr. Speaker. I shall not take up the time of the House. I am in no condition——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman for a moment on the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I trust the Chair will let us have order, because my voice is in such condition that I can not afford to strain it.

I want to call the attention of the Speaker to section 6 of Article I of the Constitution:

The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States. They shall in all cases, except treason, felony and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other place.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, this House has passed upon this question at various times; and if the Chair will bear with me for just a moment, and I want to assure the Chair that my sole object—I can not be heard, Mr. Speaker, in this confusion.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. Gentlemen will please be seated and cease conversation. The gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. As I was saying, my sole object is to have the House placed where the privileges of its own membership may be preserved inviolate and its dignity maintained. There has been so much said about this affair, and so many attacks made upon Members on account of debates had and speeches made here, that it occurred to me this matter ought to go to the Judiciary Committee, in order for that committee to investigate the subject and make a report; and if there is no rule regulating such affairs as this, that some rule may be prescribed, after the House is put in possession of the facts and can intelligently make and prescribe a proper rule. With this object in view, I looked up the authorities to ascertain whether or not it is a privileged matter; and I want to call the Speaker's attention to one or two decisions here.

Here is a case from volume 17 of the Congressional Globe, beginning on page 1068, a case where the Commissioner of Indian Affairs wrote a letter calling in question some remarks made by a Member upon the floor in debate. That matter was called to the attention of the House and was thoroughly discussed. Mr. Woodward, a Member of Congress, speaking to the resolution, said that—

His intention was to express his view of the conduct of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in sending to this body an insulting and offensive communication.

The communication is too long to read, and I will print it in the RECORD, but it simply called in question the remarks made by the Member, and there was no insulting language in it, in the commonly accepted sense of that term. Quoting further from Mr. Woodward:

It appeared to him that everything was tending to the humiliation and debasement of the legislative branch of the Government.

Prophetic! What a picture he painted of the present! He continues:

If a similar communication had been addressed to the executive branch, or even to one of its subordinate departments—the War or the State Department—it would have been regarded as an outrage. He (Mr. Woodward) would have so considered it. And he did not hesitate to declare that he would vote to dismiss from office any officer of this House who, in his official position, should be guilty of such an act. Should the Clerk of this House, the Sergeant-at-Arms, or any other subordinate take it on himself to address the President in the language which one of his subordinates has presumed to throw into our face this morning, there is not a Member on this side of the House who would not demand his dismissal from office. And he (Mr. Woodward) would readily accede to the demand.

Now, that was the character of the discussion. The resolution not to receive this communication would undoubtedly have been adopted had not the offensive communication of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs been withdrawn by Mr. Fries, who had presented it.

In the further discussion of this same case, on page 1070 of the Congressional Globe, Mr. Thompson, addressing the House, said:

When an individual Member of this House thought proper to attack an individual out of the House, this House as a House could know nothing of it. It was a matter for the two individuals to settle between themselves. But the man feeling himself aggrieved had no more right to send into this House a paper applying abusive epithets to the Member than he had to insult the Speaker for having signed a bill which might not be entirely consistent with his own private opinions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if he had no right to do that, then I ask, Has a subordinate officer of this Government or a superior officer of this Government, in the executive branch or in the judicial branch, a right to send broadcast all over the world, publish in all the newspapers in the land, file in the archives of a department of the Government, there to remain as long as the Government itself stands, an attack on a Member of this House for what he may have said in debate on this floor? That is exactly what that resolution states has been done; and further, this Member [Mr. RAINEY] is denounced as having uttered an untruth in debate; is so denounced by the Secretary of State, at the direction of the President, and is so denounced in an official communication to the representative of a quasi-foreign power.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is one of the gravest breaches of the privileges of this House. It is a breach of the privileges of the Member, and it is an indignity to the House itself; and it occurs to me that the time has come when this House, if it desires to have the respect of other branches of the Government and of the world, should begin to assert itself along the lines of maintaining its dignity.

I have nothing to say as to the merits of this controversy. I know nothing about it, and care less; but I do say that this provision of the Constitution is a wise one—wise because it is a guaranty that here in this Hall, where the representatives of a free people meet to deal with the most sacred rights of a great people, there shall be the freest of debate on all questions, with no fear of molestation, no matter how powerful may be the persons or interests whose conduct may be criticised. Outside people, even though they do belong to another branch of the Government, ought not to be permitted to engage in debate—and it is engaging in debate to all practical intents and purposes—with Members upon this floor. The outsider has no oath as a lawmaker to observe, no responsibility rests upon him, and he is answerable to no constituency.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that I have done my duty in submitting the resolution asking that the Judiciary Committee, the law committee of this House, take this matter and everything connected with it under advisement and report to the House if anything should be done; and I respectfully submit that the calling in question of the truthfulness of a Member on account of his official acts, the denunciation of the Member as a falsifier for words spoken by him in debate, and the characterization of him to a foreign official as so unimportant (in his representative capacity) that the President of the United States has not seen fit to read what he said—if that is not a breach of the privileges of that Member, and is not an indignity and an insult to this House, then I think it would be hard to frame language that would carry a breach of the privileges of the Member or an insult to the House; and I submit that the resolution is in order. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Under the permission given me to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] I shall print some few precedents which I conceive to be in point, and shall make a few further observations of my own.

The case involving a discussion of the letter of the Hon. W. Medill, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, is found in volume 17 of the Congressional Globe, Thirtieth Congress, first session, beginning on page 1068 and ending on page 1070, and is as follows:

Mr. Fries presented a letter from Mr. Medill, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in reply to a speech made by Mr. Clingman two or three days since, in which he expressed his belief that there was gross corruption in the Bureau of Indian Affairs. The letter from Mr. Medill denied that there was any corruption in his office, and charged Mr. Clingman with having made false and unfounded assertions, and asked that a committee might be instituted to inquire into the charges.

Said communication was read, and is as follows:

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States:

During the debate which took place in the House of Representatives on an amendment made by the Senate to the civil and diplomatic bill, allowing to David Taylor the sum of $12,800 for a certain reservation claimed by him under the treaties of 1817 and 1835 with the Cherokees, as reported in the National Intelligencer of this morning, I find the following, viz:

"Mr. Clingman supported the claim, and took occasion to warn the committee against any opposition which might have been made to it by Mr. Medill, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who, he understood, had endeavored to prejudice the claim, because the agents of the claimant peremptorily refused to make an allowance for his favoring the claim. Mr. C. denounced the Indian bureau as thoroughly corrupt. He had been credibly informed that the books in that bureau had been altered and falsified for corrupt purposes (though this, he believed, had been done during the incumbency of Mr. Crawford, the predecessor of the present commissioner). He had no confidence in Mr. Medill, nor would he believe any statement he should make. An application had been made to the department to have the books taken out of his office and deposited in some place where they would be safe from alterations."

It is seldom that a public officer is justified in noticing attacks of this kind; but the above charges are of so grave and specific a character, and so seriously reflect, not only upon myself, personally and officially, but upon the administration of the whole of that branch of the public service intrusted to my charge, that a different course on this occasion seems to be called for. If true, I should be driven from the office I now hold with ignominy and disgrace, to become an object of scorn and contempt to all upright and honest men; and proper legislation should be had at the earliest period to punish such abuses and prevent their recurrence. If untrue and without any foundation, it is due to every principle of justice and common fairness that the fact should be authoritatively ascertained and published to the world, that neither myself nor the office may rest under imputations so injurious, and which I unqualifiedly and indignantly pronounce to be wholly and basely false in each and every particular.

I beg leave to state the following facts and circumstances for the consideration of your honorable body. The claim of Mr. Taylor, who is a white man married to a Cherokee woman, never came before the Office of Indian Affairs for its action. That office had nothing to do with the claim, and could and did take no cognizance of it. Like others under the treaty of 1835 with the Cherokees, it was to be adjudicated and settled, as required by the seventeenth article of that treaty, by commissioners appointed by the President and Senate. Four different boards of commissioners were appointed and organized under that article, which sat for the transaction of business—in all, about five and a half years. Mr. Taylor's claim, in one shape or another, was before the whole of them. By the first board he was allowed $1,518—being the amount which he had paid to the State of Tennessee under a law of that State—with interest thereon, to obtain a fee-simple title; in addition to which he claims the value of the reservation as unimproved land. This has not been allowed by either of the boards of commissioners. The second board declared the claim "res adjudicata—not considered by present commissioners." The third board decided that Mr. Taylor had no right to the claim, whatever interest there was remaining being in his Indian wife and her children, the reservation having been taken in right of the wife under the treaties of 1817 and 1819 with the Cherokees. So far as he himself was concerned, the action of this board was adverse; but the question of the interest of the wife and children was left open for consideration on such evidence as might be produced in support thereof. So it stood until the organization of the fourth board, by which it was simply dismissed, without any formal or specific action upon its merits.

When the amendments of the Senate making an appropriation for this claim, and for certain claims of the Creek Indians, were under consideration by the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, I was summoned by that committee to give information respecting these claims. I accordingly appeared before the committee and gave such information as it was in my power to furnish, which was almost exclusively of record, and derived from the official records and papers I had taken with me and submitted to the committee. And I have yet to learn that the committee discovered the slightest evidence or trace of any alteration or falsification, by myself or anyone in my office, of these records and papers. This was the only occasion on which I have ever been called upon to take any part in relation to this claim; and I am sure the Committee of Ways and Means will bear testimony that I made no effort to prejudice them against the claim further than the statement of the facts from the records, which it was my duty to give to them. Where, then, can there be any grounds for the base, wanton, and malicious charges against me in reference to it? I can trace them to no other cause than disappointed pecuniary expectations, as it is generally understood that Mr. Taylor has been in the habit of making promises of liberal rewards to those whom he believed could aid him in obtaining the amount of his claim.

I consider it not out of place, and I respectfully ask the permission of your honorable body, to advert to the position of the honorable gentleman, who made the charges quoted, in another case recently before you; and, in view of the facts and circumstances connected therewith, it is hoped that he will join in the application now made, or at least not oppose it.

It will be recollected that the Senate made an amendment to the bill making appropriations for the Indian Department by which a large amount was to be paid to certain Cherokee Indians in North Carolina from the Treasury of the United States. I was summoned before the Committee of Ways and Means to furnish information respecting this case, when the honorable gentleman also appeared as an advocate or attorney and strongly supported the claim as it passed the Senate. The committee and the House saw proper to disagree to the Senate's amendment, and made an important alteration therein, which might seriously have affected the interests of the Indians, or rather of the white speculators interested in the claim. Yet, notwithstanding the peculiar position occupied by the honorable gentleman, as stated above—which, however, could not have been known to the honorable Speaker of the House of Representatives—he became one of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses of Congress on this same claim. Notwithstanding this remarkable circumstance, and the honorable gentleman's peculiarly zealous advocacy of Mr. Taylor's claim, it is hoped he will not be adverse to others endeavoring to vindicate themselves from unjust aspersions. Indeed, the gentleman's own position was so peculiar and delicate a one that it was to have been expected that instead of rising in his place and making gratuitous and calumninous charges against others, he would, if he really believed there were good grounds for those charges, have moved for a committee of investigation, of which, by the usages of your honorable body, he would have been the chairman, by which course he could have ascertained the truth without bringing into question his own singular and extraordinary position. Not having done so, and having pursued the wanton and unjust course he did, devolve upon me the duty of making this application. Wherefore I respectfully pray that your honorable body immediately appoint a committee with full and ample power and authority to require books and papers, to examine witnesses, and to investigate fully, not only the foregoing charges against myself and the office and department of Indian affairs, but any others that may be brought to the knowledge of the committee; and likewise all the facts and circumstances respecting or in any way connected with the two claims adverted to, of Mr. Taylor and the Cherokee Indians of North Carolina, and their advocacy before the commissioners under the treaty of 1835 and the committees and Houses of Congress.

I invite the most rigid scrutiny into the affairs of the office intrusted to my charge, as well as into my personal acts in any way directly or indirectly connected with the public service. And I can not but think that that spirit of magnanimity and sense of justice, which it is the duty of every American citizen to attribute to your honorable body, will at once prompt you to accede to this application, necessary as the same is with reference to the preservation of the purity and respectability of the public service, and called for as it is by justice to the character and standing of a man grossly and unjustly assailed in your honorable body, where, unless permitted by you, he has not the right to appear and defend himself.

W. MEDILL,
Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, Washington, August 11, 1838.

The reading of the letter was frequently interrupted and objected to, on the ground of its offensiveness to the dignity and character of the House.

Mr. Rockwell, of Connecticut, rose, and defended the rights and privileges of the Members of the House against such attacks from a subordinate officer of the Government. He concluded by moving that the letter be not received.

Mr. Fries replied than an attack had been made on the floor of the House by the gentleman from North Carolina on Colonel Medill, to which no honorable man would submit. He was willing to admit that the letter was not couched in the most respectful language. The commissioner had been charged with corruption and fraud, to repel which it was not to be supposed that he would be very careful in choosing his language. He hoped that a committee would be raised to inquire into the charges made by the gentleman from North Carolina, as was asked by Mr. Medill.

Mr. Clingman said the report of his remarks in the Intelligencer, in which he had alluded to the corruption of the Indian Bureau, was not entirely accurate, but, from information received since he had made those remarks, he was satisfied of the corruption of that bureau. He also reiterated some of the strong language which he had heretofore used in relation to the commissioner.

Messrs. Burt and Evans followed, and spoke at some length against the reception of the letter of Mr. Medill, on account of the offensive language in which it was couched. The privileges of the House secured the freest and most ample debate, which should, however, be exercised with prudence, but under no circumstances could it be tolerated that an officer of a subordinate department of the Government should send to this House an offensive communication like this. If he had felt aggrieved, he should, in the first place, have ascertained from the honorable gentleman from North Carolina if he was correctly reported; and in the next place, he should have asked for an investigation. But he had gone beyond this, and written an insulting letter, which the House could not receive without forfeiting its own self-respect. The Executive had long sought to degrade the House, and now he had an imitator in one of his subordinates.

Mr. Woodward said he had no remarks to offer in relation to the propriety of the course pursued by the honorable Member from North Carolina [Mr. Clingman], nor did he rise to vindicate the supposed privileges of Members of this House. He denied that any privileges existed except by the positive provisions of the Constitution, or such as Congress might enact, in pursuance of its right of exclusive legislation in this District.

His intention was to express his view of the conduct of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in sending to this body an insulting and offensive communication. It appeared to him that everything was tending to the humiliation and debasement of the legislative branch of the Government. If a similar communication had been addressed to the executive branch, or even to one of its subordinate departments—the War or the State Department—it would have been regarded as an outrage. He [Mr. Woodward] would have so considered it. And he did not hesitate to declare that he would vote to dismiss from office any officer of this House, who in his official position, should be guilty of such an act. Should the Clerk of this House, the Sergeant-at-Arms, or any other subordinate, take it on himself to address the President in the language which one of his subordinates has presumed to throw into our face this morning, there is not a Member on this side of the House who would not demand his dismissal from office. And he [Mr. Woodward] would readily accede to the demand "Yes, sir; could I separate your character as Speaker from your constitutional privileges as a Member of this body, I would vote for your dismissal under like circumstances. And, sir, I shall expect from the Executive the same justice I am so ready to accord to him. I shall expect him to dismiss Colonel Medill from office, or, at all events, to subject him to some proper reproof." As he [Mr. Woodward] would defend the executive department from insult and aggression on the part of our subordinates, so he would expect the Executive to defend the legislative department against aggressions and insult from his subordinates. "It has come to this, that a subordinate in one of the departments presumes to send an insulting communication to this House, and, what is still more humiliating, to demand of us certain proceedings thereon, and we are expected, upon his demand, to go into the question of the infamous conduct of one of ourselves! Sir, I shall expect every Member on this floor who does not bear in his bosom the heart of a Tory to repel, indignantly, this insult upon the American House of Commons, thus offered by a subordinate in another branch of the Government. If the honorable Member from North Carolina [Mr. Clingman] has done injustice to the commissioner, Mr. Medill, let Mr. Medill seek satisfaction outside of these walls in such manner as he may think best upon his own responsibility. I shall consider myself as having no right to interfere."

Mr. Faran next obtained the floor.

Mr. C. J. Ingersoll said he wished very much to hear the communication read. He had not heard a word of it.

Mr. Faran spoke of the importance of the officer at the head of the Indian Bureau being a man of the highest honor and the strictest integrity, and said whenever any member of the executive or legislative department attempted to degrade that officer in the public estimation, to represent him as not resisting corruption or spurning a bribe, such an effort, particularly when made from the legislative department, should meet on the spot with instant rebuke. Never could he ask any department of this Government to respect him when he did not respect himself; nor could this House be respected by the country when it would not respect itself. If Members of this House would charge the basest corruption upon persons who stood at the head of the Treasury, and who should be men of the nicest honor and the strictest integrity, he said they should never shrink from any investigation which might be asked by that officer or by any Member of this House.

What he complained of was that the gentleman from North Carolina, if he believed the charges which he had preferred were true, had not long since brought them before the House and demanded an investigation. But when, having failed to do this, he got up at the heel of the session and threw out in debate these charges of bribery and corruption upon the head of the Indian Bureau, it was no more than proper that that officer should repel those charges in language as strong as the gentleman himself had used.

Mr. Faran yielded the floor at the appeal of Mr. Cummins, who was proceeding to offer some remarks, when—

Mr. Duer raised the point of order that the gentleman could not yield the floor without losing his right to it entirely.

The Speaker stated that by the courtesy of the House gentlemen had been allowed to yield to others for explanations and still retain the floor; but by the strictest parliamentary law, if it was insisted upon, but one gentleman could be entitled to the floor at a time.

Mr. Duer gave notice, then, that when the gentleman [Mr. Cummins] concluded, he should object to the gentleman who had yielded resuming the floor, and should himself claim it and move the previous question.

Mr. Faran, under this intimation, resumed the floor, and after remarking that the law applied in this case was contrary to the uniform practice of the House, and expressing the hope that if insisted upon now it would be in all other cases, proceeded to say that without intimating in the slightest degree that the insinuation contained in the communication against the gentleman from North Carolina was correct (the gentleman's statement had been made, which he was bound to believe), he nevertheless held that if any Member of this House acted corruptly, it was the privilege of every American citizen, whether he held office under the Executive or not, to present the charge to this body, and a communication of that kind, he apprehended, had never been considered an insult to the House. If a Member on this floor made a serious charge against an executive officer, such as the charge of bribery or corruption, he held it was the privilege of such officer to reply to it in language as strong as that in which the charge was made. Gentleman should recollect that men out of this Hall were as sensitive to their honor as they themselves were; and it was the right of the head of the Indian Bureau, when charges of bribery and corruption were brought against him, to repel them in language as strong as that in which the charges were couched and to demand of the House an investigation. He had known this public officer long, and he undertook to say there lived not a human being of stricter integrity and nicer honor, and who more earnestly desired, as a citizen and an officer of the Government, faithfully to discharge his duties to the country. He undertook to say that the gentleman from North Carolina had been most woefully, grossly, egregiously imposed upon; and he had no doubt but the gentleman, with his high sense of honor and his liberality as a gentleman toward a gentleman, would, after an investigation, be ready to acknowledge before the country that he had been deceived and mistaken in submitting the charges. He hoped no objection would be made to a full investigation of the case.

Mr. Houston, of Alabama, appealed to the gentleman from Ohio to adopt some other mode of arriving at the facts of the case. The gentleman desired an investigation of the truth or falsity of the charges made against the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. It was proper it should be had. He considered the communication of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, though in the main unobjectionable, still, in some parts, disrespectful to the House; and he hoped that the gentleman would withdraw it and offer a simple resolution providing for the investigation, which, no doubt, would be adopted by the House. He expressed the highest confidence in the integrity and honor of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and thought the gentleman from North Carolina would find that he had been misinformed. He dissented from what he considered the result of the position taken by Mr. Wodward, viz, that the House had the exclusive right to make charges against whomsoever they saw fit to direct them, and that they who were thus charged had no right to repel and cast them back. He thought that to the practice of Members of this House themselves, in their constant denunciations of the Executive and his officers, and in bringing forward the gravest charges, might rather be traced the retorts which were provoked, than to any disposition which the executive department might have to encroach on the rights of Congress. He referred to the letter of Mr. Trist containing grave charges against the President—which he ventured to say no man of honor on this floor would get up and say he believed—and to the fact that, notwithstanding this, gentlemen on the other side were not only ready to receive the letter, but to print it. He deprecated the acrimony with which discussions were carried on on this floor, both on the part of each party toward the other and with reference to the Executive, and ascribed to this cause the fact that Members were not treated with greater respect by others.

Mr. Woodward wished to say that he thought gentlemen on this floor had the right to make use of what language they saw fit when speaking of the official conduct of the executive officers.

Mr. Cummins objected, as a point of order, to the floor being yielded, if Mr. Houston wished to retain his right to it. He wanted the same rule applied that had been enforced upon him.

Mr. Houston further enforced the propriety of gentlemen on this floor treating all whose conduct came under their scrutiny with respect, and considered it necessary in order to insure respect for themselves in return. It was too much to expect that an officer of the Government (who was but a man), when he had the gravest charges brought upon him, should not repel them with warmth. He admitted, however, it would have been the most proper course for the commissioner simply to have denied the charges and demanded an investigation.

Mr. Thompson, of Indiana, said, in his legislative experience, he had noticed one case, and one only, similar to this. Some years since, a high functionary of his own State, a state senator, had rendered himself obnoxious to his own party, and another distinguished member of the same party had presented a memorial to the lower house containing base and calumnious charges, and he was glad to say it had been indignantly spurned by the house of representatives of the State of Indiana, and the gentleman himself had barely escaped expulsion from the house by apologizing to them with tears in his eyes. This paper presented the remarkable fact that because a Representative of 70,000 people on this floor had chosen to say he had no confidence in an executive officer, that subordinate member of a coordinate department had presented a paper to this House impeaching the moral character and the integrity and honor of that Member of this House. He knew nothing of the correctness of these charges; he had known the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for ten years with some intimacy, and had never seen anything discreditable in his conduct. He was therefore prepared to enter into this investigation with something of a partiality in his favor. But he was startled when he heard gentlemen on this floor talking about executive officers being influenced by revengeful feelings toward this House. This House were the representatives of the sovereignty of the people, and constituted the grand inquest of the Nation, and yet they must not arraign the conduct of public functionaries for fear their motives should be attacked in return! Had it come to this, in the year 1848, when this great struggle was going on between executive power and the popular supremacy? What was there in what had been said by the gentleman from North Carolina to provoke such an attack?—a gentleman whom he was proud to call his friend, notwithstanding the base charges which had been brought against him; a gentleman to whose unimpeachable character it was unnecessary for him to bear testimony? He read the reported remarks of Mr. Clingman.

Mr. Sawyer and Mr. C. J. Ingersoll wished the paper of Mr. Medill to be read also.

Mr. Thompson said it could be read when he got through, and was proceeding to speak of the remarks of Mr. Clingman, when—

Mr. Clingman repeated the correction of the report which he had made at a previous stage of the debate.

Mr. Thompson understood that the gentleman from North Carolina, then, had never made such a charge as was represented. When an individual Member of this House thought proper to attack an individual out of the House, this House, as a House, could know nothing of it; it was a matter for the two individuals to settle between themselves. But the man feeling himself aggrieved had no more right to send into this House a paper applying abusive epithets to the Member than he had to insult the Speaker for having signed a bill which might not be entirely consistent with his own private opinions. The Constitution provided that Members should not be held responsible elsewhere for words spoken in debate, and the House were bound to protect them whenever they were called in question.

Mr. Collamer thought the only question properly before the House was whether the language of the paper was disrespectful to the House; and if this was the question, the language of Mr. Clingman, the justice of the charges made by him, and so forth, were not just matter of comment. And, at this late stage of the session, he suggested that gentlemen confine themselves strictly to the point at issue.

Mr. Thompson would accept the suggestion of his friend, and confine himself mainly to the question before the House. The gentleman from North Carolina had only spoken of rumors of what he had heard, and yet it was gravely argued now that for this the gentleman was liable to be insulted, and his motives arraigned by an executive officer.

But it appeared that the gentleman was incorrectly reported. He referred to the great difficulty of reporting with entire correctness in the noise and confusion of this Hall, and said the proper way for the Commissioner of Indian Affairs would have been, if he had considered the reported remarks an attack on his character, to have addressed the gentleman from North Carolina, inquiring whether he was correctly represented in the reported remarks. But the gentleman from North Carolina had said he believed the Indian Bureau was corrupt. So did he [Mr. Thompson] and so, he ventured to say, did 200 out of the 230 Members on this floor; not that the head of the bureau was corrupt, but that it was impossible for any man of however high integrity and great energy to purge the Indian Bureau of the festering corruption which existed in its various ramifications.

Mr. Clingman wished to explain, but objections were made.

Mr. Thompson continued. He was told he was wasting the whole day. The House had wasted weeks and months in discussing private and unimportant bills, and now, when he stood up to defend the high constitutional rights and prerogatives of this House, was he to be told that it was out of place?

He continued to comment on the communication as exceedingly improper in its terms, and he said it ought to be rejected by the House. If he were in order, he would offer the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the communication of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs be returned to that officer, and that he be informed that this House considers the language thereof as offensive and indecorous."

Mr. Rockwell, of Connecticut, also sent up a resolution, which was read by the Clerk. It was to the effect that the communication from Mr. Medill was disrespectful in its language, and therefore that it ought not to be received.

Mr. Burt rose to a point of order. The paper upon the Speaker's table had not been received by the House, and therefore it could not be made the subject of the action of the House. The House could assign no other reason than that which was implied by its rejection.

Mr. Dixon moved the previous question.

Various points of order were made, and some conversation ensued thereon.

Mr. Fries inquired whether he had the right, under the rules, to withdraw the communication?

The Speaker replied that he had.

Mr. Fries then said that, acting in deference to the wishes of his friends, and with the view of reaching the important object at which he and his friend, Colonel Medill, desired to arrive, viz, the obtaining of an investigation of all the charges preferred by the gentleman from North Carolina, he withdrew the communication, with the intention of moving a resolution of inquiry.

I next call attention to the case of the Hon. S. Pleasanton, at that time Fifth Auditor of the Treasury Department, who wrote a letter to the Speaker of the House taking exception to remarks made in debate by Mr. Sprigg, a Member of the House. The record of this case is found in volume 12, on pages 101–102, of the Congressional Globe, third session Twenty-seventh Congress, and is as follows:

Mr. Sprigg said he rose to a question of privilege. A letter had been addressed to the Speaker and published among the documents of the House, dated "Fifth Auditor's Office, December 14, 1842," which letter contained reflections upon him personally. He presumed the letter had been read by some of the Members, but he would ask the Clerk to read it for the information of the House:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
FIFTH AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
December 14, 1842.

SIR: In a report of a debate in the House of Representatives on Monday last, contained in the National Intelligencer of yesterday, it is stated that Mr. Sprigg, among other things, observed: "He remembered, too, that the House, at his instance, had made a call upon the department (Treasury) for full and detailed information as to the whole system of managing the light-houses of the United States, the contracts for buildings, for supplying oil, paying inspectors, etc., but no answer had ever been obtained, notwithstanding the new clerks which the House had voted them, and notwithstanding numerous and repeated promises made to him personally."

It was with extreme surprise I read this statement, as I had a perfect recollection that it was wholly erroneous; and as it is calculated, uncorrected, to injure the Treasury Department unjustly, in the public estimation, I hope you and the House will excuse me for setting the Member right.

It is sufficient to state that the whole of the information called for by the House in relation to light-houses on Mr. Sprigg's motion was transmitted, as required by the resolution, partly to the Committee on Commerce on the 8th of March last, and is contained in their printed report (No. 811); and partly to the House of Representatives direct, by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the 11th of March last, and by the House ordered to be printed, and will be found in document No. 140 of the last session. These two documents contain all the information which was called for by the House.

Mr. Sprigg individually called for the cessions of jurisdiction by the States over all the light-house sites from the adoption of the Constitution, and although so much labor and time as it required might have been declined on his individual call, yet, as I was desirous of furnishing all the information in my power to every person who sought it, the information was prepared and furnished, as far as it was to be found in the office.

This list was sent to Mr. Sprigg on the 24th of May, and had occupied one clerk about six weeks in the preparation of it; and yet he alleges no answer had ever been returned to his calls for information.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. PLEASANTON.

Hon. JOHN WHITE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

In relation to this letter, he would say that he was forcibly impressed with the opinion that, if we allowed public officers to intrude their letters before the House because of reflections made upon their conduct by Members and then place their letters among the public documents, the power of the House was, indeed, materially weakened. It was a gross insult to the House; and even if he did commit an error in relation to a public officer, had the officer a right to come before the House in this insidious manner to attack the statement of a Member? He said in this "insidious" manner, because the letter was presented to the House by the Speaker, without a knowledge of its contents by that officer, who could not be presumed able to look into every public document laid upon his table. Had the Speaker been acquainted with the contents of the letter, he had no doubt that he would not have presented it.

Mr. Sprigg then went into an explanation of the purport of his remarks at the last session, and gave a statement of the action he had taken in order to obtain information from the Treasury Department on the subject of the light-house system of the country. He read several letters which he had received from the fifth auditor, and pronounced their statements hypocritical and false. Having finished his narrative of his connection with the subject, he said he would not protract his remarks any longer. His only wish was to ascertain whether it was the will of the House that public officers should, in this insidious way, make injurious reflections on its Members. He would make a solemn appeal to the House whether voluntary and ex parte statements of this kind should constitute a part of its documents, and whether their documentary records should be swelled up at an enormous expense by printing matter such as this? The injustice, too, to the House and to individual Members by permitting letters of this kind to be printed and inserted in the documents was most manifest, for Members could not get up and reply to them and make their replies a part of the documentary history of the House alongside of the attacks made on them; but such replies could only have existence in the newspapers of the day, which would pass off and soon be forgotten. The fact was, that some of the officers of the Government about Washington were getting to be too important, anyhow; and if (said Mr. Sprigg) we do nothing else but tear away the abuses that exist among them, we shall do well. From the Executive down to the subordinate departments they had heard nothing but abuse of that House, and here was an officer whose office ought not to exist in the organization of the Treasury Department—in fact, he was but a fifth wheel anyhow—undertaking to make injurious reflections on a Member of the House, and in the most insidious manner to make them a part of its records.

Mr. Hopkins said that he had not noticed the paper alluded to until the attention of the House had been called to it by the gentleman from Kentucky. It struck him that it was a paper which ought not to have been filed or placed on the journals or printed as a part of their documents. It was not, in fact, a public document, and if its writer had any exception to make to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, the public press—the very channel through which they were made public—was open to him. Now, the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky this morning, in reply to this letter, would not find place among the documents of the House, and in this way injustice was done him, as it would be done to other Members if similar proceedings should be permitted. He did not know, however, how the object he had in view was to be reached; but he would submit to the House that, without any formal question being taken, the Clerk should, by general consent, be directed to strike the letter from the journals (which, he believed, were not yet printed), and to return the original paper, which was certainly printed without any knowledge of its contents by the Members of the House, to its author.

Mr. J. C. Clark could not believe that the fifth auditor intended any disrespect to the gentleman from Kentucky, or that it was his intention to do him any injustice. His only object appeared to have been to correct a misapprehension into which he believed the gentleman had fallen. In the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, as published in the public papers, the fifth auditor found charges affecting his official character, and he took what he supposed to be the best means of defending himself, without intending offense to anybody. Now, the question was, if a Member of Congress or a committee of the House or anybody else made allegations affecting the character of a public officer which, in point of fact, should be found to be incorrect, whether he should not have the right to defend himself and place his defense before the public in the best way in his power? Mr. Clark would refer to the cases of Colonel Totten and Mr. Winslow Lewis, who, conceiving themselves implicated by reports of different committees of the House at the last session, sent written communications to the House defending themselves, which were printed and respectively appended to the reports to which they related. No injustice had, in his opinion, been done to the gentleman from Kentucky, and he hoped that no further action would be taken on the subject.

Mr. Meriwether could not agree with the gentleman from New York. The cases cited by him were not in point, for the communications written to the House by the parties implicated were in answer to reports of two of the committees, and thus both the charge and defense were printed together as part of the documents of the House. In the present case, on the contrary, the charge and defense would not go together, one of them only being printed among the documents of the House. The remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, to which exception was taken by the fifth auditor, did not appear in the documents of the House, but were only published in the ephemeral productions of the day—the newspaper press, and thus passed off and were soon forgotten.

The usual course was for a person aggrieved to come as a memorialist, remonstrating against the action of the House; but in this case the individual came as an officer of the Treasury Department, and he relied on the report of a Member's speech in one of the common journals of the day. Now, he (Mr. Meriwether) thought the House should vindicate its honor by dashing from it such communications as these, and by instructing the Clerk to withhold the document and not allow it to be bound up with the printed documents.

Mr. Proffit said his name had been alluded to in this debate, and it was said that the Committee on Commerce had thought fit (without any complaint from him) to attack him at the last session of Congress and a speech he had made on this floor. Now, the reason why he made no complaint was because he had never seen nor heard of the report until it was spread on the record and circulated to the country. He made a speech on the light-house system, himself believing honestly in its maladministration, and no gentleman answered him—not even a single member of the Committee on Commerce that he recollected—yet a few weeks afterwards he found that the Committee on Commerce had allowed Mr. Pleasanton to pervert his language and to present it before the country.

Mr. Sprigg. And further, sir, they sent your speech to him and invited remark.

Mr. J. C. Clark was understood to say that it was not done with his knowledge.

Mr. Sprigg. Why, he states so himself.

Mr. Proffit. Yes; and not even a letter from any auditor; but Mr. Winslow Lewis, of Boston, was allowed to write a letter, in which there was a perversion of his (Mr. Proffit's) speech; and he had no means of knowing it until he found it spread before the country, and until this moment he had never had the opportunity to show the injustice that had been done to him. Now, what ought the Committee on Commerce to have done? Why, at least, when they received those letters from Mr. Winslow Lewis and Mr. Pleasanton, they should have asked him if he chose to reply to those letters. If he had not been confined to his bed by sickness when the appropriation bill was before the House, he would have made such statements on the light-house system as would have startled both the House and the country. At present he had not strength to say much more, but he had no hesitation in saying that if he had known of these letters and had had the opportunity to speak to the House on the subject, independent of all party feeling, nine-tenths of the House would have joined him in stopping the printing of that report, even coming, as it did, from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. J. C. Clark said it had not been intended to do injustice to the gentleman. But Mr. Winslow Lewis, who had been mixed up with the dicussions on the light-house system, feeling himself aggrieved, presented a respectful letter to one of his (Mr. Clark's) colleagues, and that letter was appended to the committee's report without comment. They simply gave Mr. Lewis's statement with their report, which had not been adopted by the House; and the gentleman from Indiana would have the opportunity, when the next appropriation bill was before the House, to take up the matter and give his own explanations; and if Mr. Lewis (a gentleman of great distinction, who had built many light-houses) had been guilty of bad management or peculation, the gentleman from Indiana could show it.

Mr. Underwood, in the course of some remarks, disapproved of this course of allowing individuals to reply to the speeches of Members on that floor. If a committee of the House was about to act on the character of an individual, it would be proper to hear that individual; and when General Gratiot was about to be proceeded against as a defaulter, that course was followed, for he had himself presented a statement containing General Gratiot's own version of the transaction. But when a Member rose and made a speech in which, by way of argument, he stated a fact, to allow any officer to come in with a contradiction would involve them in interminable confusion.

The Speaker explained that the letter came to him as a communication from the Treasury Department, and, as such, he had presented it to the House without perusal; if, however, he had known the purport of the communication, it should not have been presented.

Mr. Meriwether then submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the communication addressed to the Speaker of this House by S. Pleasanton on the 14th instant, in relation to some remarks made in the House before that time by Mr. Sprigg, a Member from Kentucky, which paper was received by the Speaker and laid before the House without a knowledge of its contents, was not such a communication as ought to have been received and presented to the House; that the same be withheld from the Journal and files of the House, and the original be returned to the writer."

The resolution was then adopted.

The letter of Mr. Pleasanton, it seems, was not read by the Speaker before it was printed in the Globe. In fact, the Speaker, page 102, stated that if "he had known the purport of the communication it should not have been presented." After some discussion a resolution, as the record shows, was adopted declaring the letter to be such a communication as should not be received by the House, and directing that it "be withheld from the Journal and files of the House, and the original be returned to the writer."

Now, here was a case where this officer of the executive department wrote a letter in which he used no stronger language than simply to say that the statement of the Member of Congress excepted to "was wholly erroneous," and yet Members denounced it, and the House struck it from the Globe.

The Supreme Court of the United States had occasion to review the section of the Constitution involved here, in the case of Kilbourn v. Thompson et al., and at October term, A. D. 1880, handed down an opinion which included remarks very pertinent to the point now at issue. In that case the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Miller, says that our provision of the Constitution, namely, section 6 of Article I, is borrowed from the English Bill of Rights as declared by Parliament and assented to by the Crown. The court approves the construction adopted by the English courts to the effect that—

> The freedom of speech and debates and proceedings in Parliament ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Parliament. (Hinds's Precedents, vol. 3, sec. 2675.)

In the first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress a case arose in which it was declared an invasion of privilege for a Member in debate to read a letter from a person not a Member calling in question the acts of another Member. This was the case in which the Hon. James G. Blaine, then a Representative from the State of Maine, read a letter from James B. Fry, provost-marshal-general, in which the latter impugned the official conduct of the Hon. Roscoe Conkling, a Representative from the State of New York. A resolution was adopted for the appointment of a special committee of five to investigate and report; and that committee, composed of such distinguished and able statesmen as Samuel Shellabarger, of Ohio; William Windom, of Minnesota; Benjamin M. Boyer, of Pennsylvania; Burton C. Cook, of Illinois; and Samuel L. Warner, of Connecticut, among other things in their report, said:

> Your committee deem it proper most earnestly to protest against the practice which has obtained to some extent of causing letters from persons not Members of the House to be read as a part of personal explanation, in which the motives of Members are criticised, their conduct censured, and they are called to answer for words spoken in debate. Such attacks upon Members made in the House itself and published in its proceedings, and scattered broadcast to the world at the expense of the Government, are, in the opinion of your committee, an improper check upon the freedom of debate, a violation of the privileges, and an infraction of the dignity of the House. (Hinds's Precedents, vol. 3, sec. 2686.)

If a letter from a provost-marshal-general was "an improper check upon the freedom of debate," how much more is a letter from the "American premier" in which it is declared he is acting under the direction of the President of the United States likely to prove—

> An improper check upon the freedom of debate?

When the Hon. Schuyler Colfax was Speaker of this House, during the second session of the Fortieth Congress, almost the identical question involved here came up for determination. That was the case in which the Hon. Elihu B. Washburne, a Representative from the State of Illinois, made an attack in the columns of a newspaper on the Hon. Ignatius Donnelly, a Representative from the State of Minnesota. The question was on the adoption of a resolution for the appointment of a special committee to investigate and report. Mr. Speaker Colfax said:

> The Chair is of the opinion that this is a question of privilege upon the ground that "charges affecting the character of a Member of Congress," when made distinctly, even by a person not a fellow-Member, are regarded as questions of privilege. General charges and denunciations, vague and not specific in their character, are not usually regarded as questions of privilege.
> But when charges have been made in newspapers by persons not holding the relations to a Member of Congress that a fellow-Member does, imputing distinctly that affecting the honor and reputation of a Member, they are regarded as questions of privilege. This, however, is subject to the rules of the House, and if objection is made to the consideration of this resolution the Chair will submit to the House the question: Shall the resolution be considered at this time for its decision?

The resolution was agreed to. The report of the committee, so far as the same is material here, was in substance to the effect that a publication in a newspaper of charges affecting the Member in his representative capacity was a breach of the privileges of the Member. If the charges concerned the Member in his individual capacity only, then the publication would not constitute a breach of his privileges. (Hinds's Precedents, vol. 3, sec. 2691.)

The case here, Mr. Speaker, is much stronger than the case just cited. In the case here the alleged offender occupies the exalted position of Secretary of State, the chief place in the Cabinet of the President of the United States. He declares in the publication itself that in what he is doing he is acting under the direction of the President of the United States himself. The publication is addressed to the diplomatic representative of a foreign government. It is given out to the various news agencies of the country, who are all anxious to get news from so high a source, and by them scattered broadcast by publication in all the principal newspapers of the land, and it is filed in the archives of the State Department of this Republic, in the permanent records of that department, there to remain as long as the Government itself shall last.

And what of the subject-matter of the publication? In its terms it seeks to belittle the personality and to minimize the importance of the Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, a Representative in this House from the State of Illinois. It refers to him as unimportant, and holds him and his efforts here in the discharge of what he conceives to be his duty up to the representative of a foreign government and to the whole world as an object of ridicule. Aye, Mr. Speaker, it goes further and charges the gentleman from Illinois with uttering untruths in the course of a speech delivered in this House. Is not this the calling of a Member in question for words uttered in debate here? Does not the Secretary of State criticise a Member on account of a speech made here? Is not this an attack upon a Member for and on account of a speech made by the Member in course of debate in the orderly procedure of this House? Could there be a clearer violation of the constitutional provision in question?

During the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress when Mr. Speaker Henderson was in the chair, the Hon. Frank C. Wachter, a Representative from the State of Maryland, raised a question of privilege on account of a certain publication in a Baltimore newspaper. A point of order was raised, and the Speaker overruled the point of order, holding that a question of privilege was involved, the Member having been "attacked in his representative capacity." (Hinds's Precedents, vol. 3, sec. 2694.)

In the case of Hon Joseph H. Acklen, a Representative from the State of Louisiana, the House entertained as a question of privilege newspaper charges against a Member in his representative capacity, and ordered an investigation. (Hinds's Precedents, vol. 3, sec. 2696.)

In the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, on a resolution offered by Hon. THETUS W. SIMS, then and now a Representative from the State of Tennessee, the Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON, then Speaker, held that a newspaper article charging Members of Congress—without naming any of them—with abusing the "franking privilege" constituted a breach of the privileges of the House. (Hinds's Precedents, vol. 3, sec. 2705.)

In the first session of the Twenty-ninth Congress the House by a decisive vote held an employee of the House having charged in a newspaper that a Member uttered a falsehood in debate, that this was a breach of the privileges of the House. (Hinds's Precedents, vol. 3, sec. 2718.)

With the precedents cited, it seems to me there can be no question that Mr. Bacon has been guilty of a gross breach of the privileges of a Member of this House, of the privileges of the House itself, and has been guilty of an infraction of the dignity of the House. Such communications are well calculated to deter timid men who may happen to be Members of this House in the future from engaging in that free debate contemplated by the Constitution. Many men might be inclined not to engage in discussion upon this floor if their views should happen not to coincide with the views of the administration, if some high and mighty official of the State Department is to be privileged to hold them up to ridicule without let or hindrance. The rule should be enforced, the dignity of the House should be maintained, and the constitutional privileges of our membership should be preserved inviolate.

If an outsider, be he public official or private citizen, is unjustly assailed here, he has his remedy, ample and complete. He can memorialize this House, set out the injustice, and ask the relief, and I am confident this House of Representatives will never become so weak and cowardly as to deny justice to an outraged American citizen.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has listened carefully to the reading of the preamble and the resolution. It seems to the Chair that if a question of privilege be presented at all by this resolution, it is presented in the communication by the Secretary of State by direction of the President to another government. It is true that a Member of the House shall not be called in question in the performance of his duty. As to what is meant by being "called in question" is a matter that the House must determine for itself when the matter is presented by proper resolution. The Chair takes it that a citizen might criticise the remarks of a Member of the House, from a friendly or an unfriendly standpoint, without violating the privileges of the House.

In this case neither the Secretary of State nor the President has sent any communication to the House. It has referred in answering the communication from a foreign government to the words spoken by a Member of the House. If the Secretary of State, as an individual, had made this criticism, the Chair thinks it is entirely probable that there would have been no question of privilege presented, or if in a newspaper editorial such a remark had been made touching the speech of a Member, the Chair very much doubts whether it would present a question of privilege.

There are some precedents, however, where more than one Speaker has submitted the matter to the House as to whether a question of privilege is stated in the resolution. The Chair prefers in this case not to pass upon the point of order, sustaining the same, but believes it would be better to take such action as it seems proper by overruling the point of order; and whether a question of privilege is involved, or even a shadow of a question of privilege, will be for the House to determine. Therefore, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. And on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PUJO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be again read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the resolution be again reported. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the resolution.

The Clerk proceeded to again report the resolution, as follows:

Whereas on the 26th day of January, A. D. 1909, this House of Representatives being then in session at the Capitol, and having under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union H. R. 26305, in "general debate," the Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, a Representative in the Congress of the United States from the State of Illinois, then and there delivered from his place on the floor of the House an address in which he discussed the manner in which the Government of the United States acquired rights on the Isthmus of Panama with relation to the proposed canal across said Isthmus; the manner of consummating the contract for the purchase of the canal property; the conduct of certain persons, officials, and nonofficials connected therewith; and the general subject of the acquirement, construction, and management of the said Panama Canal, as well as the acts and doings of the said persons in and about the same; and

Whereas on the 29th day of January, A. D. 1909, in the open session of the House of Representatives, the same being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and having under consideration in "general debate" H. R. 26915, the said, the Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, a Representative as aforesaid, again further addressed the House in Committee of the Whole, as stated, on the subject aforesaid, and in continuation of his address so delivered as aforesaid on the said 26th day of January, A. D. 1909; and

Whereas on the 9th day of February, A. D. 1909, the Hon. Robert Bacon, Secretary of State of the United States, caused to be composed, written, printed, and published in certain and numerous newspapers which are published in the city of Washington and elsewhere throughout the United States, and which are of general circulation in the United States and elsewhere, as well as making the same by filing therein a part of the permanent records of the State Department of the United States, a certain document alleged to be in reply to a communication said to have been received by him, the said Hon. Robert Bacon, Secretary of State as aforesaid, and to have been written by some official of the Government of the Republic of Panama taking exception to and complaining of the said addresses of the said Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, a Representative as aforesaid, in behalf of his Government, the said Republic of Panama, and which said document so composed and published by the said the Hon. Robert Bacon, Secretary of State as aforesaid, as the same was published and appeared in the Washington Post, a daily newspaper published at the city of Washington, D. C., in its issue of the 10th day of February, A. D. 1909, and which said newspaper has and enjoys a wide circulation throughout the United States, was and is as follows, viz:

"SIR: The President directs me to say in answer to your communication of February 9, 1909, that the remarks complained of were made in the House of Representatives. Under our Constitution we have, for what we regard as wise reasons, provided that for any speech or debate in either House they (the Senators and Representatives) shall not be questioned in any other place.

"This provision we regard as essential to secure full liberty of speech to the elected representatives of the people; and we feel that such liberty of speech should be preserved, even though it may occasionally be abused.

"It ought to be understood that the utterances of individual Members are not to be taken as expressing the views either of the Government of the United States or the House in which such remarks are made. As regards the statement in question made by Representative RAINEY, the President attached so little importance to him that he had not even read them until your protest came.

Mr. OLMSTED (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the reading at that point? I think there is a mistake there. I read the letter when it appeared, and it did not say "attached so little importance to him," but "to it."

Several MEMBERS. "To them."

Mr. CLAYTON. "To him" in the text that I read.

The SPEAKER. In the resolution as read from the Clerk's desk the word "him" is used. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Florida that it is suggested that the word "him" is used in the resolution which he had presented to the desk instead of the word "them;" that is, that as it is read here the "him" referred to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], and the word "them" would refer to the statements.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the copy I saw used the word "him." I noticed it particularly that the word "him" was used.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I read the statement in the newspapers, and my recollection is that it said "them" and not "him."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I copied it, and I know what it said.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest that the gentleman from Florida ought to have his resolution perfect and that he should strike out the word "him" and insert the word "them."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I can not go back on the senses of my own vision. I saw the word "him."

Mr. CLAYTON. And I saw it also as the gentleman from Florida saw it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the resolution.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 188, nays 121, answered "present" 7, not voting 69, as follows:

Mr. MUDD with Mr. TALBOTT.

Mr. CARY with Mr. WEISSE.

Mr. JACKSON with Mr. WOLF.

Mr. MCGAVIN with Mr. PRATT.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks on the point of order. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for about three minutes in which to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a moment ago, in the resolutions that have just been laid upon the table, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] recited that, as published in the Washington Post, the following language appeared as regards the statements in question made by Representative RAINEY:

> The President attached so little importance to him that he had not even read them until your protest came.

During the rereading of the resolution I arose and stated to the House, when the question was brought up by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], that my recollection of the account that I had read in the public prints was that the President said he attached so little importance "to them," instead of "to him." I have since obtained a copy of the Washington Post of that day, and I find that the language as recited in the resolution is verbatim the language as published in the Washington Post.

I was therefore a little bit afraid that what I said might do some injustice to Mr. CLARK of Florida, the author of the resolution. I either read it in some other paper as I recited it, or, if I read it in the Post, I read it with my mind rather than with my eye; in other words, read what ought to have been written rather than what was written. I say ought to have been written, because I take it for granted that unless the Secretary of State wanted to go out of his way to be effusively and personally and illogically offensive he would have used the word "them" rather than the word "him." The object of my making this statement is that no injustice shall be done to the language of the resolution or to the accuracy of quotation of the gentleman from Florida in quoting it. Having set out in the resolution that he was quoting from the Washington Post, he was, of course, compelled to quote what that paper said verbatim—whether accurate or inaccurate—whether it was a correct copy of the original instrument or not. I am furthermore informed that all efforts on the part of Mr. RAINEY to get a copy of the original instrument have been unavailing.

SABINE AND NECHES RIVERS.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 27363) to provide for improving the navigable capacity of the Sabine and Neches rivers, and the canal connecting the Sabine and Neches rivers with the mouth of Taylors Bayou.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to permit the counties of Jefferson and Orange, or any subdivision thereof, in the State of Texas, or any citizen or citizens of said State, to improve the navigable capacity of the Sabine and Neches rivers, and the canal connecting the mouths of these rivers with the mouth of Taylors Bayou, by deepening and otherwise improving the same, such work to be done in accordance with such plans and specifications as may be approved by him on the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers: Provided, That the prosecution of the work shall be subject to the supervision, control, and regulation of the Secretary of War, and to such special conditions as he may impose for the protection of the interests of the United States: Provided further, That the entire cost of any work which may be done under authority hereby granted shall be borne by the party or parties to whom the permit is issued: And provided further, That the Secretary of War shall have full power and authority to cooperate with said counties of Jefferson and Orange, or subdivisions thereof, or citizens, in the making of contracts for the improvement, and, if deemed expedient, may direct the disbursement of such funds as may be provided for such improvement by the party or parties to whom this permit is granted, and under such terms and in such manner as may be mutually agreed upon by the Secretary of War and the party or parties to whom this permit is granted.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

In line 4 strike out the words "and directly" and insert the words "in his discretion;" and strike out all after the word "issued," in line 6, on page 2, and insert the following:

"And neither this act nor any privilege acquired or work executed thereunder shall be used as the basis for any claim against the United States for remuneration for any expenditures made by the said party or parties: And provided further, That the methods to be pursued in executing the work herein authorized, including the making of the necessary contracts and the expenditure of the funds provided, shall be such as may be mutually agreed upon by the Secretary of War and the parties to whom the permit is issued."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know from the gentleman just what the United States is giving up in this bill, if anything.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, while this bill is local in its nature, it is of interest to the entire people of the Government. The purpose of the bill is to permit the counties of Jefferson and Orange, in the State of Texas, or some subdivisions thereof, to expend their own money in deepening the canal from the mouths of the Neches and Sabine rivers to deep water at Taylors Bayou. The canal that they propose to deepen was dug 10 feet deep by the Government, and no appropriation is provided in the present rivers and harbors bill for further work. The citizens of the localities in interest propose themselves to raise the money to dig the canal to a depth of 25 feet. They ask permission of Congress that they may do it. The legislature of the State of Texas recently, at the instance of these people, passed a law permitting them to tax themselves and to issue bonds, but before this can be done two-thirds of the voting taxpayers of the district must consent to the issuance of the bonds by vote.

Mr. PAYNE. If I understand the question, then, this channel has been practically abandoned by the United States and the Government is making no further appropriation.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. No; the gentleman from New York is in error.

Mr. PAYNE. Are there any improvements being made on it?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. No; but the anxiety of the people to have the work immediately done and the conditions there with respect——

Mr. PAYNE. The Government, the gentleman said, was making no further appropriations.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Not in the present bill. The present bill recognizes this project, and the Rivers and Harbors Committee suggest in the bill that if the citizens want to cooperate the Government would willingly accept their cooperation.

Mr. PAYNE. What committee reports this bill?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the statement that the committee has offered an amendment. I understand that there is no pride of opinion with the committee respecting that amendment. The objection that I have to this amendment—and that objection, I think, will appeal to this House—is this, that the amendment makes a legislative declaration that this bill shall not be the basis for any future return by the Government of the money; that is to say——

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The gentleman is in error.

Mr. MANN. I have it before me.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Then read it.

Mr. MANN (reading)—

And neither this act, or any privileges acquired, or work executed thereunder, shall be used as a basis for any claim against the United States for remuneration for any expenditures made by these said parties or party.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The anxiety to have this work done at once induces me to object to this amendment. The taxation to be levied and collected from the people for this worthy project and the money raised by the people expended, the people have the right to expect that the Government would afterwards refund the money; in fact, it should be done. Now, if you throw it in their faces that the money shall not be refunded, by this legislative declaration, if you make this legislative brutum fulmen, you deter men from voting for this proposition who otherwise would vote for it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit? The gentleman has asked unanimous consent, and objection has been reserved, for the consideration of the bill which the gentleman has sent to the desk, which included amendments. Now, if he proposes to offer an amendment striking out the committee amendment, I shall have to object.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I was bound and now I am gagged, and I consent to the amendments.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not go to the Senate and try to get it stricken out, because we will have to think that would be bad faith.

The SPEAKER. Without objection——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there is a proposition which the gentleman now makes to let certain parties advance certain money in reference to——

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Not advance; appropriate.

Mr. MANN. That is the proposition of the gentleman at present, to advance money for improvements, and then proposes to have that reimbursed. If the gentleman consents to the committee amendment, it is believed that the gentleman does not expect that the committee amendment will be in the bill when it comes back from the Senate.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The gentleman draws from his fertile imagination in that. If I could control the Senate, Mr. Speaker, I would answer the gentleman. I do not know what the Senate will do.

Mr. MANN. I think we had better ascertain, then. For the present, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. For the present, I object.

PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a brief statement for the sake of accuracy. I have called up the Secretary of State and have had read to me over the telephone the press copy of the original letter of the Secretary of State, to which reference has been made to-day. It reads:

As regards the statements made by Mr. RAINEY, the President attached so little regard to them that he had not even read them until your protest came, etc.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am glad to hear it was published both ways. I thought I had read it that way somewhere.

Mr. OLMSTED. It referred not to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], but to the statements.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question in reference to the statement read.

Mr. OLMSTED. I ask unanimous consent that the statement may follow the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would like to ask the gentleman a question before I give my consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida that he may ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] a question? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would like to know what the gentleman read?

Mr. OLMSTED. I read from my own manuscript, taken down at the telephone from the original letterpress copy of the original letter of the Secretary of State as read to me from his office not five minutes ago.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does the gentleman know who read it to him?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes; the private secretary to Mr. Bacon, the Secretary of State.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. As I understand it, standing at the telephone here in the Capitol the gentleman took down what the secretary of the Secretary of State said was a letter press copy of the original letter? Is that what I understand?

Mr. OLMSTED. He read to me from the impression made in the letter book from the original letter signed by the Secretary of State.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; that is his statement to you?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly. He read the letter to me from the book. He did not know what was going on up here.

FUNDS OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House joint resolution No. 53.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior be, and they are hereby, required to make to Congress a report of the moneys received from all sources for the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota on account of the sale of lands and timber under the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," approved January 14, 1889, and the acts amendatory thereto, together with such items, if any, as may have been realized from other sources for the benefit of said Chippewa Indians, and the disbursements made from said funds.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Reserving the right to object, what is the necessity for this resolution?

Mr. STEENERSON. The necessity is this: Twenty years ago last month an act was passed disposing of about 4,000,000 acres of land belonging to the Chippewa Indians. Part of them were pine lands and part were agricultural, and the Government has been disposing of millions of dollars of timber, and the Indians do not know how much credit they are to have. Of course it costs a lot of money to do this work for the Indians, and they are anxious—like you or I would be—to know how much the resulting net credit is to them. They want the report to Congress after these twenty years, in order to find out whether they have got anything to their credit or not. The resolution was unanimously reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the Interior Department has approved it, as shown by the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 19, 1908.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt, by your reference of May 14, 1908, of H. J. Res. 53, being a joint resolution to provide for an accounting of certain funds held in trust for the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota.

This resolution has received the favorable consideration of the department, and I recommend that it be passed.

Very respectfully,

JAMES RUDOLPH GARFIELD,
Secretary.

Hon. JAMES S. SHERMAN,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,
House of Representatives.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why has not the Indian Bureau kept informed as to how much money they have there which belongs to these Indians?

Mr. STEENERSON. They have been trying to find out for many long years.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Who?

Mr. STEENERSON. The Indians.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not asking about what the Indians are doing. I am asking about what the Indian Bureau is doing.

Mr. STEENERSON. The Indian Bureau does not control it. The Treasury Department controls it in part and the Interior Department in part.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why has not the Treasury Department kept them informed?

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, I can only say that these Indians, most of them, live in my district, and they are anxious to know how they stand. I have introduced this resolution for the purpose of finding out, and I believe it will bring the information.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but I want you to answer my question. What is the reason the Treasury has not voluntarily informed them?

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not know.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEENERSON. An identical resolution has already passed the Senate (S. R. 88), and I ask to substitute that for this.

The SPEAKER. Is it identical?

Mr. STEENERSON. Identical; word for word.

Mr. MANN. Is the Senate resolution upon the desk?

Mr. STEENERSON. They might send it up.

Mr. MANN. Is it the original engrossed copy?

The SPEAKER. The engrossed copy is not here, but is evidently before the committee, so that the gentleman's request should be to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Have you not the original?

Mr. STEENERSON. I have not the original.

Mr. MANN. Then you better postpone your request until you get the original.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must have the Senate bill.

Mr. MANN. Better postpone your request.

The SPEAKER. The matter can go over for the present, until the gentleman gets the bill.

Subsequently,

The SPEAKER. In the meantime the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] has found the original Senate resolution (S. R. 88) identical with the House resolution. Is there objection to discharging the Committee on Indian Affairs from the consideration of the Senate resolution, and considering the same now?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent the corresponding House resolution (H. J. Res. 53) was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. STEENERSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution passed was laid on the table.

SALE OF TIMBER ON ALLOTTED INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate bill 4548. The bill was objected to the other day, and I now ask unanimous consent for its consideration with an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to consider in the House at this time the following Senate bill, with an amendment which he proposes. The bill was read on a former day.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4548) to provide for the sale of timber on allotted Indian land, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the bill the following:

"The Secretary of the Interior shall have authority to call on the Forest Service for assistance in carrying into effect the provisions hereof and of regulations he may prescribe hereunder, and also to determine what expenses shall be paid from the proceeds of the sale of the timber."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Washington, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMERICAN NATIONAL RED CROSS.

Mr. AMES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 27473.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 27473) to amend an act approved January 5, 1905, entitled "An act to incorporate the American National Red Cross."

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 5 of section 3 of an act approved January 5, 1905, entitled "An act ot incorporate the American National Red Cross," be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Fifth. And to continue and carry on a system of national and international relief in time of peace and apply the same in mitigating the sufferings caused by pestilence, famine, fire, floods, and other great national calamities, and to devise and carry on measures for preventing the same."

SEC. 2. That section 4 of the said act be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any person within the jurisdiction of the United States to falsely and fraudulently hold himself out as or represent or pretend himself to be a member of or an agent for the American National Red Cross for the purpose of soliciting, collecting, or receiving money or material; or for any person to wear or display the sign of the Red Cross, or any insignia colored in imitation thereof, for the fraudulent purpose of inducing the belief that he is a member of or an agent for the American National Red Cross. Nor shall it be lawful for any person or corporation, other than the Red Cross, not lawfully entitled to use the emblem of the Red Cross hereafter to use such emblem or any insignia colored in imitation thereof for the purposes of trade or as an advertisement to induce the sale of any article whatsoever heretofore had registered.

"If any person violates the provisions of this section he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be liable to a fine of not less than one or more than five hundred dollars or imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, or both, for each and every offense. This fine so collected shall be paid to the American National Red Cross."

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Page 1, after line 11, at the bottom of the page add:

"Provided, That funds contributed for relief purposes of a specific and local character shall be applied to the particular purpose for which the contributions were made until, in the judgment of the central committee, all needed relief and rehabilitation of individuals, families, and institutions has been realized. Any balances of relief funds contributed for special purposes, which, in the opinion of the central committee, are not needed for the special object or purpose for which the contributions were proposed shall be credited to the general emergency fund for national and international relief, and may be used in the discretion of the central committee for mitigating the sufferings caused by war or by any great national or international calamity occurring in time of peace."

Page 3, line 2, after the word "the," insert "American National;" and page 3, line 3, after the word "the," insert the word "emblem;" and in the same line after the word "cross," insert the words "on a white ground." On page 3, line 5, after the word "thereof," insert the words "or the words 'Red Cross' or 'Geneva Cross.'"

Page 3, after line 7, insert the following:

"From and after the 19th of December, 1911, it shall be unlawful for any person, corporation, or association, other than the American National Red Cross and its duly authorized agents, and the sanitary and hospital authorities of the Army and Navy of the United States, and such persons, corporations, and associations as have acquired rights, prior to the passage of this act through the registration of the red cross as a trade-mark in the office of the Commissioner of Patents of the United States, to use, within the territory of the United States of America and its exterior possessions, the emblem of the red cross on a white ground, or any sign or insignia made or colored in imitation thereof, or the words 'Red Cross' or 'Geneva Cross,' for any purposes whatever."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Reserving the right to object, and not desiring to object to the consideration of this bill until I understand its provisions, I will inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] what is meant by the bill when it declares that if persons shall do certain things, there named, it shall be an offense against the United States, which are denounced as crimes and punished? Is it intended simply to take jurisdiction of such offenses when committed in the District of Columbia and the Territories and such places over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction? I will also ask him whether this is an effort to make it a crime in the States to commit the offenses when the United States Congress has no power to create a crime in such States, or to make these acts offenses against the General Government? If so, I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. AMES. Mr. Speaker, this is analogous legislation to that which we have enacted in reference to the use of the flag as an emblem. I do not know that I can more perfectly answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, whenever Congress undertakes to define an offense against the United States and provide the punishment for such act, Congress must somewhere have jurisdiction under the Constitution granting it the power to so designate the act a crime. Now, I would like to inquire of the gentleman, or anyone else interested in this bill, where Congress derives power to say that the use of any emblem of the Red Cross as a trade-mark is a crime which can be punished by Congress, except in the District of Columbia, in the Territories, and in those places over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction?

Mr. AMES. Does the gentleman not think that the Congress of the United States has power to prevent the improper use of the United States flag excepting in the District of Columbia?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. When you undertake to make it a crime in places over which the United States has no legal jurisdiction, I do not think Congress has any such power; and so far as the flag is concerned, I do not know of any adjudicated cases, but I know that of recent years the Supreme Court of the United States have steadily adhered to the proposition that Congress has no authority to make those acts a crime in the States unless such power is derived from the Constitution, and the Constitution limits the power of Congress to declare what crimes are and the places over which it may exercise criminal jurisdiction. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to stand in the way of any proper amendment to this act incorporating the Red Cross Society.

Mr. AMES. Will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. AMES. This bill is drawn to conform to the terms of a treaty entered into by the United States. It simply carries out its provisions.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Congress can not by treaty violate the Constitution of the United States any more than Congress can by legislative enactment violate the Constitution of the United States, and possesses no more power in the one case than in the other. That is my view of the matter, and I think it can be sustained by authority. So far as I am concerned, very reluctantly I oppose this bill, but as I have always undertaken to object to this sort of provision, which undertakes to extend to Congress the power of creating offenses and declaring crimes and their punishment, which Congress has no power to do, I must feel constrained, unless it is remedied, to enter my objection against this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objects.

Subsequently,

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I have been appealed to, and I am willing to withdraw my objection to the consideration of the bill and let it be considered at this time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee object?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I reserve the point of order.

The SPEAKER. But does the gentleman object?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If you put it that way, if you force me to make my point of order, then I will not do it. I will withdraw it. I thought I had a right to reserve it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none. The gentleman can make a point of order to the bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I had the right to reserve it also, Mr. Speaker, I thought.

The SPEAKER. What right? Under what rule?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The right to reserve a point of order, because it is done here continually, every day, just as the gentleman from Georgia did a few minutes ago.

The SPEAKER. But there is no point of order pending, and there is no point of order that is not in order now that would have been in order before.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I reserved the right to object to the consideration of the bill. That is what I wanted to do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am glad the Chair understands me now. I understand the Chair. All I want is for the gentleman to tell me what the bill is. I think I am for it, but I want to know more about it.

Mr. AMES. The bill is to amend an act creating the Red Cross, and the amendment desired is in two particulars only—to provide a way for the disposition by law of the balance of funds contributed for special relief purposes. They do that now under their own rules, but they want the authority of law, as it would be impossible to pro rate small contributions in case some came in after an emergency had passed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This is the organization whose object is the relief of the army and navy in time of war and for the relief of victims of disasters, and all that sort of thing?

Mr. AMES. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And now you want a charter from the Federal Government?

Mr. AMES. No; we are trying to prevent the abuse of using the Red Cross emblem for trade purposes. The gentleman will see that it is used for many things—baking powder, and so forth.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then, I do not make any objection.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. AMES. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. This is a matter——

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is this bill under consideration?

The SPEAKER. Yes; and so announced by the Chair.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I very rarely object to the consideration of any bill. I have read the bill, and I am perfectly willing that the House should take it up for consideration, but I do not yield my views on the subject, nor will I vote for the bill as presented, for the reasons I stated when I reserved the objection, and the Chair misunderstood me and thought that I made an objection.

I did not intend to object because of the great, good services to humanity that this organization renders. But, however great its service is to humanity, I am not willing to vote for the bill because, as I said, it undertakes to do what I believe to be illegal and unconstitutional. I believe that if any case ever arises under the bill where a man is indicted for an offense designated in this bill, for which serious punishments are prescribed, they can not sustain a conviction under its provisions. Therefore the rights of everyone who may violate the provisions of the bill are not affected; the courts will take care of that. It is simply the precedent of Congress undertaking to prescribe crime and punishment for acts such as are named in this bill that I object to. Now, Mr. Speaker, having voiced my objections, I shall content myself by not voting for the bill.

Mr. AMES. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this society looks after the sick and wounded in the army and the navy in time of war and in times of epidemic. I am going to vote for this bill.

The provisions may seem severe, but there are people who have been trying to impose upon this society. We know in time of epidemic and in times of war and other trying conditions these charitable people, these good people, are imposed upon, and I think it is the duty of Congress to bar impostors and take care of these people, messengers of love and comfort under the trying conditions.

I am not familiar with the details of the bill; all that I have gotten was from the debate to-day. The provision as to the emblem of the society, the Supreme Court has upheld the state law of Nebraska that makes it a crime to use the flag for advertising purposes. (Hoalter v. Nebraska, 205 U. S. R., p. 34, 1907.) The Federal Supreme Court and state supreme court upheld the law, and that being the case, I do not see why we can not pass a similar law and give the Supreme Court a chance to uphold this.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

OSAGE TRIBE OF INDIANS.

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of S. R. 76, a joint resolution relative to homestead designations, made and to be made, of members of the Osage tribe of Indians.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That homesteads of members of the Osage tribe of Indians in Oklahoma may consist of land designated from any one or more of their first three allotment selections taken under the act of Congress approved June 28, 1906, entitled "An act for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes," the designation thereof to be subject to approval by the Secretary of the Interior.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, is that a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. McGUIRE. It is a unanimous report of the committee, recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and desired by him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is there any objection that you know of on the part of any of the other Oklahoma Representatives?

Mr. McGUIRE. None whatever. I do not know of anyone who has any objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you know that they are in favor of it?

Mr. McGUIRE. I do not know that they are all in favor of it. There is one of the Oklahoma Members who is a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and he was there when the bill was reported. My colleague [Mr. CARTER] is a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did Mr. CARTER vote for this report?

Mr. McGUIRE. There was no opposition to it on the committee. I do not know that Mr. CARTER voted for it, but I think he did. Mr. CARTER is here, and he can speak for himself. There was a bill passed in 1906 allotting the Osage Indian lands. They were to designate their homestead from any one of the three allotments. A number of them desired not to take their allotments from one of the three, but a portion from one, two, or all of the three, distributing them, and this is desired by the Indians. There is no opposition anywhere that I know of.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, that was a unanimous report of the committee, and I was present; and I think that everybody—the Indians, the committee, and everybody else—all are in favor of it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. McGUIRE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution passed was laid on the table.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR CHEYENNE, WYO.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate joint resolution 126, authorizing the Secretary of War to donate six condemned cannon to the city of Cheyenne, Wyo.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to donate to the city of Cheyenne, in the State of Wyoming, six condemned bronze fieldpieces, with their carriages, which may be available and may not be needed in the service: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States in connection with the donation of the above-mentioned articles of ordnance property.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. SULZER. Do I understand that this is a Senate bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. Has it been reported by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House?

Mr. MONDELL. It has, unanimously. It conveys six condemned cannon to the city of Cheyenne, Wyo.

Mr. SULZER. I have no objection to the bill.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4027. An act to parole United States prisoners, and for other purposes;

S. 8245. An act to authorize appeals to be taken from the judgments of the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States in certain cases now pending before the Court of Claims, and for other purposes;

S. 7226. An act granting certain land in the city of Alva, Okla., used for land-office purposes by the Government, to the city of Alva, Okla.;

S. 4229. An act for the relief of Capt. John C. Wilson, U. S. Navy, retired;

S. 7298. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901;

S. 8518. An act empowering the juvenile court of the District of Columbia to issue execution on forfeited recognizances;

S. 8918. An act to provide for the payment to certain Indians of Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, in North Dakota, for certain horses condemned and destroyed by the Bureau of Animal Industry in the years 1906 and 1907; and

S. 8058. An act authorizing the Attorney-General to appoint as special peace officers such employees of the Alaska school serivce as may be named by the Secretary of the Interior.

INTERNATIONAL FIELD SPORTS, VIENNA.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the further consideration of the President's message of January 4, 1909, relative to the international field sports in Vienna, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

To discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from further consideration of the President's message of January 4, 1909, relative to the international shooting and field sports exposition in Vienna, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the motion by direction of what committee?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. By direction of the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I move to strike out the words "Industrial Arts and Expositions" and insert the words "Committee on Foreign Affairs."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "Industrial Arts and Expositions" and insert "Foreign Affairs."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York and myself were about to ask unanimous consent for three minutes in which to explain the reasons for this motion.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the vote be vacated, and also ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] may have five minutes if he desires as much, and I may have five minutes, if I desire as much, to explain the matter to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the action of the House agreeing to the amendment be vacated, and that the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from New York may have five minutes each for debate. Is there objection?

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the motion as amended.

The question was taken, and the motion as amended was agreed to.

MONTANA, WYOMING AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 24149) granting to the Montana, Wyoming and Southern Railway Company a right of way across the Fort Keogh Military Reservation, Mont., with Senate amendments thereto.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree to the Senate amendments——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the Senate amendments will have to be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Then the bill will have to go to the Committee on Military Affairs if that point of order is sustained.

The SPEAKER. The point of order in the opinion of the Chair is well taken, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RESURVEY OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 24835) authorizing the necessary resurvey of public lands, with Senate amendments thereto.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The Chair announced the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. MONDELL, Mr. VOLSTEAD, and Mr. ROBINSON.

BUCKET SHOPS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 20111) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia" relative to gambling, bucket shops, and bucketing, with Senate amendments thereto.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL FIELD SPORTS IN VIENNA.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of entering a motion of reconsideration on the vote just taken on the reference of a certain message respecting the international field sports in Vienna.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 28245), with Mr. CAMPBELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs and preservation of public buildings: Repairs, and preservation of custom-houses, court-houses, and post-offices, quarantine stations and marine hospitals, buildings and wharf at Sitka, Alaska, buildings not reserved by the venders on sites acquired for buildings or the enlargement of buildings, and other public buildings and the grounds thereof, including necessary wire screens, under the control of the Treasury Department, exclusive of personal services, except for work done by contract, $550,000: Provided, That of this amount not exceeding $50,000 may be used for marine hospitals and quarantine stations, including wire screens for same, and not exceeding $12,000 for the Treasury, Butler, and Winder buildings, at Washington, D. C.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 39, line 8, strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one hundred."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman where the provision for marine hospitals, carried in this item this year but not heretofore, has heretofore been carried?

Mr. TAWNEY. It has always been carried in this provision. The repairs are under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department, the Supervising Architect. Now we have added the buildings in the quarantine service, owing to the fact that we have taken over the quarantine service in a number of States.

Mr. MANN. It was not carried in this item last year.

Mr. TAWNEY. My bill says it was. I do not know.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman may be like a good many other people. Here is the law, and the gentleman can look at it.

Mr. TAWNEY. The amount carried this year is $50,000, and the Supervising Architect called on me since this bill was reported and called attention to the fact that $50,000 would not be sufficient to meet the necessities of the service in view of the fact that the quarantine buildings have all been brought under the jurisdiction of his department, and if the gentleman will read Public Laws, page 254, appropriation for new offices, and so forth, first session Sixtieth Congress, he will find under the provision for repairs and preservation of public buildings the proviso:

That of the sum hereby appropriated $50,000 may be expended for marine hospitals.

Mr. MANN. Where is that item?

Mr. TAWNEY. In the same paragraph which you have before you.

Mr. MANN. I will read the paragraph through if the gentleman wants me.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, read it through.

Mr. MANN. For repairs and preservation of public buildings. It is carried in a different place——

Mr. TAWNEY. The language is changed owing to the fact we have changed——

Mr. MANN. Is this purely for repairs?

Mr. TAWNEY. Almost entirely so. Not a dollar can be expended for anything else.

Mr. MANN. Under the language of the proviso you could expend for building new hospitals if you want to do so.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I do not think the construction of the language would justify that statement. It has never been done; it has all been expended for repairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, until their removal becomes necessary, to rent any building or buildings not reserved by the venders on lands heretofore or hereafter acquired for building sites or for the enlargement of building sites, the proceeds to be deposited in the Treasury, and a report thereof to be submitted to Congress at the beginning of each regular session thereof.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that paragraph. I want to ask the chairman of the committee what has been the practice heretofore with reference to the buildings?

Mr. TAWNEY. The practice for several years has been to collect these rents and turn them into the Treasury of the United States; but with buildings in the custody of revenue officers, part of the revenues could be used for certain miscellaneous expenditures made out of these receipts. The law now requires all the proceeds to be covered into the Treasury, instead of part of these proceeds.

Mr. GARRETT. So a part of them only have heretofore been covered into the Treasury?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes. They were allowed to make certain expenditures out of the proceeds, and the department has found it is better administration to require all the proceeds to be turned into the Treasury, and then specific allowances made for such expenditures as have heretofore been made out of the receipts from the rent of buildings under the control of these custodians.

Mr. GARRETT. This amendment proposes, as I understand, where the Secretary of the Treasury has contracted for a site, and the vendor still is in possession, to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to rent the building that is on the site. In other words, it puts the Federal Government in the real-estate business.

Mr. TAWNEY. Where the Federal Government has acquired title to a building and it is not ready to go on with the construction, it is only a question of whether the building shall be occupied and the occupant required to pay the rent, or allow the occupant to occupy the building free, or allow the building to stand vacant.

Mr. GARRETT. Now, in making contracts with reference to a site, they make provision with reference to the use of the building; do they not do that now?

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no uniform rule, and it seems to me that the provision is a proper one.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, perhaps I may give some information. Under existing law the Treasury Department has the authority to purchase sites, and if these sites have buildings on them that will not be removed at once the vendor is usually given the privilege of collecting the rent from this building; and heretofore bargains have been made for the use of this building with these vendors, who have the privilege of occupying free of rent, or in consideration of the price of sale, and we have had the matter up in the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and but for this provision in this bill we should have felt as though it was necessary to bring in here a special bill covering that point. It is a very wise provision, in my judgment, that all the rents hereafter collected shall go into the Treasury, and then whatever expense might be incurred should be paid out of the Treasury for these buildings.

Mr. GARRETT. That is the opinion of your committee?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The unanimous opinion of the committee.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would add to the statement of the gentleman from Missouri the further statement that some years ago the Government bought a site for a post-office building here in the city of Washington, and that is where this provision originated in the first instance. That site is covered with buildings. Now, Congress has not authorized the improvement of that property, and these buildings are all occupied, and the Secretary of the Treasury now has authority to not only rent, but also to make necessary repairs, and there is quite an amount of revenue from rent of those buildings right here in this city.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana move to strike out the last word?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. A statement was made on the floor not long ago to the effect that the Government expended annually in the payment of rent in the neighborhood of $425,000.

Now, can the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] tell about how much revenue the Government receives from rents of buildings such as are now under discussion?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I am unable to tell, but I am sure the Treasury Department can furnish this information.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I will ask the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. When the gentleman refers to the rent of $400,000, what does he mean?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Public buildings here in the city of Washington.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Here in the city of Washington?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I am not aware that the Government derives any income from those rents at all.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Has the Government heretofore been collecting any rents from property situated in such way as those now under discussion?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Very frequently.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Now, can the gentleman give us some probable estimate as to the amount of money?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I can not.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], in answer to the question, that the Government is expending in the District of Columbia about $450,000 for rents.

Mr. COX of Indiana. But the question I am trying to get at, if I can get the information, is how much rental does the Government receive from buildings such as contemplated under the provision?

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will take the hearings before the sundry civil subcommittee, he will find a statement there in full.

Mr. COX of Indiana. It is so voluminous that I have not time to do so.

Mr. TAWNEY. They are indexed. He can readily turn to it. I have not the information at hand.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses of public buildings: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to execute and give effect to the provisions of section 6 of the act of May 30, 1908 (35 Stat., p. 537, pt. 1): For compensation of skilled draftsmen, civil engineers, computers, and such other services as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary and specially order, to be employed only in the office of the Supervising Architect exclusively to carry into effect public-building legislation Provided, That the expenditures on this account for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, shall not exceed $400,000; for compensation of supervising superintendents, superintendents, and junior superintendents of construction, inspectors of public buildings, and inspectors of mechanical and electrical engineering, in connection with the erection and inspection of work on public buildings, at rates of compensation to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, but in no case exceeding those heretofore authorized to be paid out of appropriations for public buildings: Provided, That the expenditures on this account for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, shall not exceed $300,000; for compensation of mechanical labor force, including carpenters, plumbers, machinists, and such other services as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary and specially order, including the compensation of superintendents and assistant superintendents of repairs, engaged in work incident to repair of buildings, mechanical equipment, and vaults, safes, and locks, at such rates of compensation as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, but in no case to exceed for any one person the rates current for similar services at the time and in the place where such services are performed: Provided, That the expenditures on this account for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, shall not exceed $112,500; for expenses of superintendents, including traveling expenses of inspectors and other officers and employees, on duty in connection with work on public buildings, under orders from the Treasury Department, office rent, and expenses incident thereto, for superintendents, including temporary stenographic and other assistance incident to the preparation of reports and the care of public property, etc.; for commissions to disbursing agents in accordance with law; for cost of advertising; for office supplies, including drafting materials, specially prepared paper, typewriting machines and equipment, stationery, and such other articles and supplies as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary and specially order or approve for the use of the office of the Supervising Architect; for contingencies of every kind and character, including surveys, plaster models, photographs, test-pit borings, mill and shop inspections, compensation and expenses of judges to select plans, care of sites acquired for public buildings, commissions to architects under the provisions of the act approved February 20, 1893, traveling expenses of site agents, recording deeds and other evidencies of title, telephone service at completed public buildings for use of custodians, and such other minor and incidental expenses not enumerated, connected solely with work on public buildings and the acquisition of sites, as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary and specially order or approve; in all, for the foregoing objects for general expenses of public buildings, $800,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question in reference to this paragraph and the commissions, and so forth, that are paid under it? The question was raised yesterday in the committee as to how much is paid for the preparation of plans, superintendence, and so forth. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] this morning stated that he was informed that 7½ per cent was taken out of the appropriation for particular buildings for the preparation of plans, and so forth. Now, here is an appropriation of $800,000 for superintendence and commissions to architects under the Tarsney Act, and so forth. How is the money paid? Out of this appropriation or out of the appropriation for specific buildings?

Mr. TAWNEY. Heretofore the appropriation for the preparation of plans and specifications and office expenses of superintendence was paid out of the appropriation made for each specific building. There was a great deal of complaint on account of that, and at the last session of Congress a law was enacted or a provision was carried in the public-building act authorizing and directing the Treasury Department to submit estimates at the beginning of each session of Congress of the amount required for preparing plans and specifications for buildings previously authorized or that would be prepared during that year, and also to estimate the amount necessary for superintendence and all incidental expenses and all office expenses connected with the administration of a public-building act.

The amount estimated by the department was $1,000,000, and the amount recommended by the committee is $800,000 for the next fiscal year, which amount it is doubtful if it will be sufficient, although, inasmuch as this is an entirely new method of providing for this service, the committee thought that it would be wise to not appropriate the full estimate. After experience under this provision it may not be necessary to expend as much as was estimated.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, the tax last year was 7½ per cent, to be exact?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do they take that out of each one of these appropriations?

Mr. TAWNEY. Up to the present time they have; or, not the present time, but up to the time of the enactment of the public-building bill at the last session of Congress. Seven and one-half per cent is not the total amount in each case. I have in mind a case investigated last summer where the amount set aside from the appropriation made for the building was 10 per cent. From now on they can not set aside any of the amount appropriated for the construction of a public building.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman says that that will be the case from now on?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; since the enactment of the last public-building law.

Mr. MANN. Did that forbid it?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; it is forbidden; and in addition to that, they are required to submit their estimates annually.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How do they get their pay anyhow?

Mr. TAWNEY. We carried $25,000 in the appropriation bill of last session for defraying incidental expenses up to the 1st of July, 1909, and that amount is only about one-fourth of the amount that will be required. We have a deficiency estimate of $75,000, which will be necessary to cover the remainder of this fiscal year.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How does it happen that after Congress makes an appropriation to erect a public building that it takes so long a time to get the thing started? Now, does not that grow out of the hitch in the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not think so. I would like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why does it take so long for the people to determine the location of the building after the authority for the purchase of the site and the construction of the building has been given?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is dead easy.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is one of the principal causes of delay. No plans or specifications can be prepared until the site has been selected, and usually the local controversy over the location consumes from six to twelve months.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. As to the local controversy about the location of the building, it is very easy to clear that up. The various business interests in towns, especially the active real-estate agents, pull and haul and cavort over the selection of sites. I know that is going on in my district in one town now. But there is another town where there was no controversy about the site, or very little. The site was selected, and it took the big end of another year to get them started erecting the building.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, if the gentleman will permit me right there. I do not think it is fair to make comparison between the facility with which work is done in a private architect's office and the facility with which work is done in the Supervising Architect's Office. You can go to a private architect and employ him to draw plans and specifications for a private building. You know something about the kind of building you want, and the architect can go to work on your plans immediately. He has only one building at that particular time, or he may have only two or three on hand; but here in the office of the Supervising Architect there are now in the course of construction or preparation, and so forth, 175 buildings scattered over all parts of the United States. It is impossible to do the work as expeditiously as in a private office unless we authorize the employment of a force for the Supervising Architect's Office of sufficient size to prepare these plans all at once. Necessarily, there will be delay.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There would be no delay if they would do what I said yesterday they ought to do, and that is to have four, five, or, if necessary, half a dozen, or even a dozen, plans and specifications over there to use a duplicate of one of them whenever you erected a building.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to suggest right here, if the gentleman will permit me, that would be all very well if all Members of Congress and Senators could be induced to accept the same plan for the same character of building.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is what ought to be done.

Mr. TAWNEY. But as soon as you attempt that local influence is brought to bear upon the Member of Congress and the Senator for a different type of building, so that the office here would have to change its plans all the time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I had a talk with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a little while ago on this subject, and I will say that I picked up some information, as we do always from him, and his suggestion was that if the Architect of the Treasury would go to work and erect business buildings, instead of undertaking to erect monuments to the man that got the appropriation, we would get along better. I see my friend from Iowa, Colonel HEPBURN, up, and I want to refresh the memory of the House with a suggestion he made here a year or two ago, as I recollect it, and that first started me to thinking about this. Colonel HEPBURN declared upon the floor of the House, as I recollect, that they could take $500,000, or some sum in that neighborhood, and build a post-office building in the city of Chicago like they build office buildings there that would answer every purpose of the Post-Office Department, as well as a three or four million-dollar house built there after the usual style of building these public buildings.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. To correct the statement? I think I said this: That I had been informed that the block on which at that time the Government was building a public building in Chicago was worth $6,000,000; that the appropriation necessary to complete that building would approximate $6,000,000, making a total of $12,000,000 invested in that building; whereas it could take about one-fourth of the amount and erect a modern twenty-story building, such as were all around it, and the Government would get larger floor space and would have $9,000,000 for buildings in second, third, and fourth class offices.

Mr. MANN. And if the gentleman will permit, we are following his suggestion, and are proposing to erect at Chicago, on the west side, a purely business block, without any frills on it, for the postal service.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, if the House will bear with me just one minute, I do not want to consume time, but I want to make one general remark about public buildings. That is, that they seem to be built more for ornament than use. Take the Congressional Library. I suppose it is the most beautiful building in the world, and yet the purpose for which that magnificent structure was put up is almost entirely defeated by devoting so much of it to ornamentation, and I enjoy the ornamentation, I suppose, as well as any man who is not a connoisseur of art. I understand the fact to be that they are already pressed over there for a room for their books; and inasmuch as every man who gets a copyright in this country has to furnish them two copies under the law, and as they buy rare books wherever they can find them and have agents in Europe and, I suppose, other parts of the earth hunting up extraordinary books, I do not know whether it is in this bill, but if it is not it will be in one in less than two years, to increase the space in the Congressional Library, that cost $7,000,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman that that was done two years ago.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. So much the worse, then; and while it is a fine building to look at, it is not adequate for the purposes for which it was intended.

Mr. TAWNEY. Let me ask the gentleman from Missouri if he does not think there should be a distinction between public buildings and private buildings? For example, if the State of Missouri was about to build a new state capitol, it would not want to take the plans of the capitol in the State of Minnesota, although that capitol is one of the most beautiful in the United States. And your counties, when they build their court-houses, do not build them alone with reference to utility. It is so with public buildings constructed for the use of the Government. Now, I do not know whether it is because of the artistic taste of the people, but it has always been the custom, and I think always will be the custom, in the construction of public buildings to build them so that they will, from an artistic standpoint, to a certain extent, be an honor and a credit to the community in which they are erected.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think of all the buildings that we ever put up, except a penitentiary, a post-office building is the one most thoroughly intended for business.

Mr. TAWNEY. Any more so than the capitol of your State?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, yes; the capitol of a State is supposed to be an ornament to the State.

Mr. TAWNEY. Any more so than the county court-house at the county seat?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I fail to see the distinction.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to strike out the last word. I do so for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of this bill if there are no other appropriations than the $800,000 carried in this paragraph for the use of the Architect of the Treasury?

Mr. TAWNEY. There is in the legislative bill a provision for the permanent administrative force; that is, the force that is there all the time to carry on the regular work of the office—the Supervising Architect's Bureau. Aside from that there is no other appropriation available for the payment of the cost of administering the public-buildings act passed by Congress.

Mr. HEPBURN. That was how much?

Mr. TAWNEY. Eighty-one thousand dollars is the amount carried in the legislative bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, I want to ask the gentleman if he is positive that no part—5 per cent, for instance, as heretofore—of the appropriation made for public buildings in this bill can be used for this purpose?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman that I am positive. I had something to do with drafting the provision that went into the public-buildings bill in the last session of Congress, for the purpose of putting a stop to the custom of deducting from appropriations made for the construction of public buildings throughout the country the amount necessary in the administration of the law.

There is no other fund or appropriation in this bill that is available for the payment of any part of that expense. Even the expense incurred under the Tarsney Act must be paid out of this $800,000.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask for information why the appropriation for the completion of these various buildings are made in piecemeal; why they are not made at the session when the original bill is passed, or why, when it comes from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, it should not include the total cost of each building, so that the contract might be let for the whole building to be erected as speedily as practicable?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think my friend from New York is a good business man. If he should authorize the construction of a large building, the construction of which would cover a period of years, I doubt if he would take out of his current revenue the total amount necessary to construct that building, and thereby, perhaps, cripple his means for several years thereafter. The appropriations are made as the work progresses. The amount is appropriated each year equal to an amount which the Supervising Architect estimates can be expended.

Mr. GOULDEN. But many of these buildings are small, costing $50,000, or $75,000, or $100,000, and it would seem that they could all be built within one or two years. I have very grave doubt whether the Government saves money by so doing, but rather otherwise.

Mr. TAWNEY. Our experience shows that it can not be done, and for that reason we appropriate for the amount of work that can be done in each given fiscal year.

Mr. GOULDEN. I will agree with the gentleman from Minnesota that the larger buildings could not be constructed in so brief a time, but the smaller buildings costing $100,000 or less I think could be. I do not think that the present method is of any advantage to the Government, but is a distinct disadvantage, and I would not be surprised if it was an actual loss to the Government of as much as 10 per cent on the cost of the building. The same business tact and knowledge should be applied to government work that prevails in private contract.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is pending.

Mr. MANN. I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I notice that this appropriation calls for $800,000, which means more than 7 per cent of the amount to be expended. We all know that it does not cost more than 3 to 5 per cent for making plans, specifications, and the supervising of the construction of buildings. Now, I do not understand——

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not exactly comprehend how the gentleman figures the percentage on the total appropriation. The total appropriation for public buildings is about $18,000,000.

Mr. SABATH. The report shows that you will not expend more than ten or fifteen millions.

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, no; specific appropriations are made aggregating the amount I named.

Mr. SABATH. But Mr. Taylor made the statement before the subcommittee that it would not amount to more than $15,000,000. Inasmuch as you have been appropriating for buildings that could not be erected during the fiscal year, I can not understand why it is necessary for us to pay 3 to 4 per cent more than any private concern or private corporation would pay for the same work.

Mr. TAWNEY. Even on the gentleman's own statement and the statement of the Supervising Architect as to the amount that can be expended, the gentleman's computation is inaccurate. If the amount is $12,000,000, $800,000 would be only a little over 5 per cent.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman [Mr. TAWNEY] is mistaken; it is nearly 7 per cent; or, to be correct, 6.6 per cent.

Mr. TAWNEY. Another factor the gentleman has lost sight of, and that is that out of this $800,000 is to be paid the services incident to the administration of the appropriation for repairs on public buildings.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman says a part of the $800,000 is used for the purpose of repairs on public buildings?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I said it was used in the administration of the appropriation made for repairs, not for the repairs themselves, but for personal services in connection with the administration for repairs.

Mr. MANN. A part of it is used, under the last public-building act, with reference to the purchase of a site on the west side, very close to the gentleman's district, if not in it, for the new public building.

Mr. SABATH. I do not quite hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. A part of this appropriation is for the purpose of carrying out the public-building act to provide for the public building on the west side of the city of Chicago.

Mr. SABATH. I hope that the Supervising Architect and the consulting architects will use better judgment than they did on the post-office building in Chicago.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman had been in the House very long, he would not have made that remark to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. SABATH. I am not making it to the gentleman from Illinois, but for the benefit of the department, because before the building was completed everyone in Chicago knew that the post-office building would not be large enough, nor would it be a building that would comply with the requirements of the business in the city of Chicago. I am afraid this department is committing a great many other such errors.

Mr. MANN. This department can not be charged with any responsibility for the present building in Chicago, because at the request of the Members of Congress in both Houses at the time the public building was provided for in Chicago it was provided that they should select an outside architect, and an outside Chicago architect is responsible for the utter inadequacy and inartistic qualities of the building.

Mr. SABATH. But the department retained the supervision, did it not?

Mr. MANN. Not at all. It was provided that all the work of supervision should be under this outside architect, and the department did not have the responsibility of it.

Mr. SABATH. Was the fence around that building also erected under the supervision of the Chicago architect?

Mr. MANN. It was.

Mr. GOULDEN. He was a Chicago architect, was he?

Mr. MANN. I regret to say that he was a Chicago architect.

Mr. SABATH. I notice under this act that $200,000 is also appropriated for outside architects.

Mr. MANN. I do not know to what item the gentleman has reference.

Mr. SABATH. Under the so-called "special act." Is not that true?

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. SABATH. That we are appropriating $200,000 under this act for outside architects.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; under the Tarsney Act. That is $200,000 included in the $800,000; that amount is set aside for expenses under the Tarsney Act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]

please tell the House where they got the architect who bungled up that Chicago post-office building?

Mr. MANN. He was appointed by the last Secretary of the Treasury under the Cleveland administration.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where did he come from?

Mr. MANN. From Chicago.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understood he did not come from Chicago.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's understanding was wrong.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why did they not get one from New York?

Mr. MADDEN. He now lives in New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. He was a Chicago architect and built one of the World's Fair buildings.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman to say a moment ago to his colleague [Mr. SABATH] that the architect who put up that building did not live in Chicago, but the one who put up the fence did live in Chicago.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman understood me incorrectly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What are the facts?

Mr. MANN. The facts are that Congress provided that a Chicago architect should be selected to draw the plans for the building and supervise the construction of the building. That was done. The architect was named by the Secretary of the Treasury just as the Cleveland administration went out. There is no criticism on the Secretary of the Treasury for naming the architect. He made a mistake, I think myself.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think all the best architects in the United States live in the city of New York?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Sure! [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I am informed that this architect of whom we are speaking now lives in New York, and my own personal opinion is that he does not contribute anything at all to the best architecture of the country.

Mr. SABATH. But I would like to inform the gentleman from Tennessee that the post-office was not completed under Mr. Cleveland's administration.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, I do not uphold the Cleveland administration in a wrong, or any other administration. I think the Democrats have less right to do wrong than the Republicans.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I was not trying to bring in any partisanship about this matter. I was simply giving information.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand that entirely. I have heard a great deal of talk about the failure of that post-office to come up to what it should have come up to, and I am trying to get at who caused the trouble, or who did not put it up right. Does the gentleman from Illinois, who has had experience evidently in this kind of business, think we should go outside of the corps of architects that we have down here in the Treasury and employ outside architects to do this work?

Mr. MANN. Congress provided by the Tarsney Act in 1893 that that ought to be done in various cases, because it provided the power of doing it, and I have no doubt that there are many cases where it is desirable to employ outside architects.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, well, to carry on the local work of executing the plans.

Mr. MANN. No; to prepare the plans. I would not have all the government buildings emanate from the same brain as to style of architecture.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand there are a number of architects down there, and they are good ones and gentlemen. They put up a beautiful piece of work in the city of Nashville, the annex to the old custom-house. It could hardly be made more beautiful, even if you got the architect from Chicago or New York. It is as beautiful as can be for the money.

Now, I do not see why it is we should use thousands and thousands of dollars in going around over the country importing some architects to carry out the plans that are made in the Treasury building.

Mr. MANN. We leave it in the discretion of the Supervising Architect to get these outside persons.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Are these plans and specifications prepared in the Treasury building by our own artists?

Mr. MANN. As a rule.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Are not they all practically prepared there?

Mr. MANN. As a rule.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then, what does the outside architect have to do?

Mr. MANN. They do not have anything to do unless the Supervising Architect engages an outside architect to prepare the plans and supervise the erection of some particular building.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. One final question. How much was that Chicago architect paid to put up this building?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my time be extended——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I object to any further extension of time on this question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think it is well enough sometimes to revive ancient history, Mr. Chairman, and I move to strike out the paragraph. Now, will the gentleman from Chicago tell me how much this architect was paid in Chicago to put up this building?

Mr. MANN. I am unable to tell the gentleman. There was a contract entered into in accordance with the provisions of the law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Can the gentleman's colleague [Mr. MADDEN] inform us on this question?

Mr. MADDEN. I can not tell the exact figures.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I still stick to the proposition I made yesterday. I may be mistaken, but I am almost certain I am not, that these architects are paid at the rate of 10 to 15 per cent commission on the value of the contract, and they are paid extra every time the plans are changed. My recollection is that is the case in the remodeling of the White House and the rebuilding at Annapolis, and I take it it is the rule——

Mr. MANN. I may say to the gentleman I think he is in error on this proposition. I think that wherever an outside architect is employed he is employed at the rate of commission fixed by the American Institute of Architects——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is true.

Mr. MANN. Which is about 5 per cent.

Mr. MADDEN. Three and a half to 5 per cent.

Mr. MANN. And no higher rate.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I stand corrected——

Mr. MANN. And that is entirely abolished under this paragraph.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But I am going to look up that 15 per cent proposition, and I will put the result of it in the RECORD. However, I am going to look it up to ascertain if I am correct, but I hope I am wrong.

Mr. MANN. I may say to my friend that is changed in the paragraph we are now discussing.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. All right, I am glad to hear it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois first.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 43, line 2, after the word "machines," insert the words "and exchange the same."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to say in connection with this matter that the outside architects employed by the Treasury Department to design buildings and superintend their construction are employed at a given percentage on the cost of the building. If they only designed a building, the percentage is about one-half what it is if they design and superintend, and the outside percentage of the cost is fixed by the American Institute of Architects at not to exceed 5 per cent of the cost. I wish to say in this connection with the architect employed to design the building is required to furnish his own offices, all his own draftsmen and engineers, and pay them out of the compensation he receives from the Government. If these outside architects were not employed, a very large additional force would be required to be employed in the Treasury Department under the direction of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and it is a question whether the employment of this additional force would not cost the Government more money than it pays for the employment of outside architects. The employment of outside architects, too, enables the Government to get different designs of buildings throughout the country. If they were all designed in the Treasury Department, they would all have the appearance of a cheese box, perhaps—all look alike—and the art feature of the buildings would not be discernible by the people of the country. The purpose of the employment of these architects is to get a variety of designs, to show the various characteristics of architecture, to encourage competition in the art, and to create a better condition of things in the erection of buildings throughout the country.

And I may say that the architects so employed are usually so employed as the result of competition. The Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department requires the submission of plans from a number of architects throughout the country whenever a public building is to be erected of any consequence, and the man submitting the best plan is usually appointed the architect for that particular building. My judgment is that it does not cost the Government any more money than it would cost if we did not employ outside talent at all. I am certain that we get better results in the very character of our architecture than we would get if we did not employ such talent. So the objection made by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] to the appropriation of the fund for the employment of outside talent is not well taken, in my judgment.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, certainly.

Mr. SABATH. I have not objected to the engaging of the outside architects, but I do object, and I agree with the gentleman from Illinois, that the bureau is in the hands of incompetent men.

Mr. MADDEN. I can not agree to that statement at all. I think the Supervising Architect is a man of superior ability, fully up to the standard required for the place he occupies.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SHERMAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to bills of the following titles:

H. R. 12499. An act for the relief of Clarence Frederick Chapman, U. S. Navy; and

H. R. 23464. An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 103.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound in cloth 1,500 additional copies of the final report of the Jamestown Tercentennial Commission, embodying the reports of the various officers of the Jamestown Exposition, held at Norfolk, Va., in 1907, with accompanying illustrations; 500 copies for the use of the Senate and 1,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

Also,

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 8918) to provide for the payment to certain Indians of Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, in North Dakota, for certain horses condemned and destroyed by the Bureau of Animal Industry in the years 1906 and 1907.

Senate concurrent resolution 102.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 15,000 additional copies of Senate document 547, Sixtieth Congress, second session, relating to customs tariffs and consisting of Senate and House reports of 1888, 1890, 1894, and 1897; 5,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 10,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 24835) authorizing the necessary resurvey of public lands, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SMOOT, Mr. FLINT, and Mr. BANKHEAD as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 26203) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BURNHAM, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. TAYLOR as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of crews of surfmen employed at the life-saving and lifeboat stations, including the old Chicago station, at the rate of $70 per month each for the No. 1 surfman in each station, and at the rate of $65 per month for each of the other surfmen during the period of actual employment, and $3 per day for each occasion of service at other times; rations or commutation thereof for keepers and surfmen; compensation of volunteers at life-saving and lifeboat stations for actual and deserving service rendered upon any occasion of disaster or in any effort to save persons from drowning, at such rate, not to exceed $10 for each volunteer, as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine; pay of volunteer crews for drill and exercise; fuel for stations and houses of refuge; repairs and outfits for same; rebuilding and improvement of same, including use of additional land where necessary; supplies and provisions for houses of refuge and for shipwrecked persons succored at stations; traveling expenses of officers under orders from the Treasury Department; commutation of quarters and allowance for heat and light for officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service detailed for duty in the Life-Saving Service; for carrying out the provisions of sections 7 and 8 of the act approved May 4, 1882; for draft animals and their maintenance; for telephone lines and care of same; and contingent expenses, including freight, storage, rent, repairs to apparatus, labor, medals, stationery, newspapers for statistical purposes, advertising, and all other necessary expenses not included under any other head of life-saving stations on the coasts of the United States, $2,087,040.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, some time ago the legislature of North Carolina passed a resolution calling upon the representatives of the State of North Carolina in Congress to vote for and advocate pensions for the men of the crews of the Life-Saving Service.

Mr. Chairman, since I have been a Member of Congress I have constantly and persistently, in season and out of season, upon the floor of the House and before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, advocated pensions for the men of the Life-Saving Service for disability incurred by them in the line of duty. I shall continue to advocate such a measure so long as I represent the State of North Carolina in part and as long as I am a Member of this House.

Mr. GOULDEN. Has the gentleman introduced a bill for that purpose, may I be allowed to inquire?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I have, sir. That is my recollection. If I have not introduced a bill, I have advocated such a bill before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and my remarks are printed in the committee hearings.

Mr. Chairman, this service is one of the most meritorious of all the branches of the government service. The life-savers are the friends of the human race. A great reputation was made by "Sunset" Cox, from the State of my friend [Mr. GOULDEN], New York, in his early service in Congress in the advocacy of the Life-Saving Service.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the present law, the act of May 4, 1882, provides:

That if any keeper or member of a crew of a life-saving or lifeboat station shall be so disabled by reason of any wound or injury received or disease contracted in the Life-Saving Service in the line of duty as to unfit him for the performance of duty, such disability to be determined in such manner as shall be prescribed in the regulations of the service, he shall be continued upon the rolls of the service and entitled to receive his full pay during the continuance of such disability, not to exceed the period of one year, unless the general superintendent shall recommend, upon a statement of facts, the extension of the period through a portion or the whole of another year, and said recommendation receive the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury as just and reasonable, but in no case shall said disabled keeper or member of a crew be continued upon the rolls or pay for a longer period than two years.

Also the present law provides:

That if any keeper or member of a crew of a life-saving or lifeboat station shall hereafter die by reason of perilous service or any wound or injury received or disease contracted in the Life-Saving Service in the line of duty, leaving a widow, or a child or children under 16 years of age, such widow and child or children shall be entitled to receive, in equal portions, during a period of two years, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, the same amount, payable quarterly, as far as practicable, that the husband or father would be entitled to receive as pay if he were alive and continued in the service.

Mr. GOULDEN. Two years is the limit, however?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. That is the limit.

Mr. GOULDEN. In both cases?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. In both cases. This provision, Mr. Chairman, of the act of May 4, 1882, is all the provision made for the men and the families of the men of the Life-Saving Service who are disabled or die in the line of duty.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion right there?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I will, sir.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is further qualified also by the fact that the comptroller has held that where a man has had sick leave, that such leave is to be deducted from the year's pay if the inability to perform service is due to the same cause for which he obtained his sick leave.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. That is true, and I think the hearing before the Committee on Appropriations, of which the gentleman is a member, shows that he had a captain of a life-saving crew in his district, of long and meritorious service, who was subjected to such deduction of pay.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman to whom my friend refers is still actively in the service, but from time to time he has had to have sick leave. Now, if he was retired, and he has had very long and distinguished service, and should undertake to claim this benefit, it would practically be no benefit, owing to the long term of sick leave that would have to be deducted.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. It is entirely correct, that when he comes to claim the benefit of the existing law he gets the benefit less the allowance he has had for absence on account of sickness. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to detain the committee. There is a bill now pending before Congress which provides for pensions for the superintendents and crews of the Life-Saving Service. This bill is Senate bill 25, and I am going to ask leave to print that bill as a part of my remarks instead of offering it as an amendment to the sundry civil bill, because I know it would be subject to a point of order if offered as an amendment to an appropriation bill.

But, Mr. Chairman, before I ask that leave, I want to say, in conclusion, that I hope this bill some day, or some similar bill, will receive favorable action. There has been some fear that pensions for the Life-Saving Service may lead to a civil pension list. I am as much opposed to a civil pension list as anybody; but the men in the Life-Saving Service are not in the same class with men who are clerks in the government service; and the Life-Saving Service can be differentiated from any other service or any other branch of the government service. I hope that some bill to pension the men of the Life-Saving Service will some day be passed by this House, and that just provision will be made for the heroic men and their families of this humane service. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print the bill, and also a resolution of the North Carolina legislature, as part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill is as follows:

A bill (S. 25) to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service.

Be it enacted, etc., That a retired list of the following-named officers and surfmen of the Life-Saving Service of the United States, namely, superintendents of life-saving districts, keepers of life-saving stations, and members of life-saving crews, is hereby created, and officers and surfmen placed upon the retired list shall receive thereafter 75 per cent of the compensation of the grade held by them at the date of retirement.

SEC. 2. That when any superintendent of a life-saving district, keeper of a life-saving station, or member of a life-saving crew in the Life-Saving Service has served thirty years in said service, he may, upon his own application, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, be placed on the retired list; when any superintendent of a life-saving district, keeper of a life-saving station, or member of a life-saving crew is 64 years of age he shall be placed upon the retired list by the Secretary of the Treasury; and when any superintendent of a life-saving district, keeper of a life-saving station, or member of a life-saving crew has become incapable of performing the duties of his position he shall be either placed on the retired list or dropped from the service by the Secretary of the Treasury as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, from time to time, assemble a Life-Saving Service retiring board, composed of one superintendent of a life-saving district, one assistant inspector in the Life-Saving Service, and one medical officer of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, for the purpose of examining and reporting upon such officers and surfmen of the Life-Saving Service as may be ordered by the Secretary of the Treasury to appear before it, or who may hereafter be disabled in the service, and the members of said board shall be sworn in every case to discharge their duties honestly and impartially, and such board shall inquire into and determine the facts touching the nature and occasion of the disability of any officer or surfman who appears to be incapable of performing the duties of his position, and shall have such powers as may be necessary for the purpose; and when the board finds an officer or surfman incapacitated for active service, it shall also find and report the cause which, in its judgment has produced the incapacity, whether such cause is an incident of service, whether due to his own vicious habits, or the infirmities of age, or physical or mental disability. The proceedings and decisions of the board shall be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury for his approval or disapproval.

SEC. 4. That when the board finds that an officer or surfman is incapacitated for active service and that his incapacity is the result of an incident of service, or is due to the infirmities of age or physical or mental disability, and not to his own vicious habits, and such decision is approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, the officer or surfman shall be placed on the retired list: Provided, That no person shall receive for the same time retired pay and the extra pay allowed to keepers and surfmen by section 7 of the act approved May 4, 1882. Officers and surfmen thus retired may be assigned to such duties as they may be able to perform, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and when so employed shall receive the full pay of their respective grades.

SEC. 5. That when a board finds an officer or surfman is incapacitated for active service, and that such incapacity is the result of his own vicious habits and not due to any incident of service, and its decision shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, the officer or surfman shall be dropped from the service.

SEC. 6. That all laws inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The resolution referred to is as follows:

Resolution 18.

Resolution (H. R. 83; S. R. 388) instructing our Senators and Representatives in Congress to favor the passage of an act for the relief of disabled members of the United States Life-Saving Service.

Whereas the employees of the United States Life-Saving Service are constantly in danger of and often losing their lives in the performance of their hazardous duties in their efforts to save and protect the lives and property of shipwrecked seamen; and

Whereas by reason of the dangers and exposure to which their duties call them they often sacrifice their lives to save the lives of unfortunate mariners, thus constantly making widows and orphans, leaving them helpless and destitute; and

Whereas the United States Congress has already provided some measure of relief: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That our Senators and Representatives from North Carolina in the United States Congress be, and they are hereby, instructed to urge the passage of an act to amend sections 7 and 8 of an act of Congress approved May 4, 1882, so as to provide that any person who has heretofore or may hereafter be discharged from the United States Life-Saving Service by reason of injury sustained or disability contracted while in the actual performance of their duties in the service shall be entitled to receive an amount equal to 50 per cent of wages received at date of discharge: Providing also, That surfmen and keepers of United States life-saving stations may retire at the age of 60 years, or after having served continuously for twenty years, and be entitled to receive an amount equal to 50 per cent of the wages received at the date of such retirement.

That copies of this resolution be transmitted to each of our Senators and Representatives in the United States Congress immediately after the same is adopted.

In the general assembly read three times and ratified this the 18th day of February, 1909.

W. C. NEWLAND,
President of the Senate.

A. W. GRAHAM,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Now, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I understood the gentleman to say that he was as much opposed to a civil-service pension list as anybody.

Mr. GOULDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have further time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will be recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Are these people not civil employees?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Why, yes; they are civil employees, but they are men who fight the storm and the tempest; they are men whose lives are constantly in jeopardy, and they are men whose lives are in jeopardy for the saving of the lives of others. I differentiate the employees of this service from any other branch of the government service.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. But the railway postal clerks are engaged in hazardous duties, also.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Well, I will say to the gentleman that when the railway mail clerk's life is in jeopardy it is caused by accident. When the storm arises, it is caused by the Almighty Himself and there is no way of controling it. It can not be controlled by any human agency; and these brave and heroic men who patrol the coast in the darkness and storm, standing there as sentinels to protect human life, ought to be put in a different class, so far as a pension list is concerned, from any other employees of the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I have not a word to say against the merits of the people who are engaged in the hazardous work of a life-saving service. But, Mr. Chairman, if we should adopt a system of pensioning any class of people engaged in the civil work, you have opened a door. There are thousands of people all over this country to-day who are advocating a civil-service pension list. We have already—and the gentleman from North Carolina voted for it——

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. What is that? I did not catch that remark.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina (continuing). We have already provided what is in substantial effect a civil-pension list for the Revenue-Cutter Service——

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Yes; I voted for the Revenue-Cutter Service bill, but it did not create a civil-pension list.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina (continuing). Upon the plea that these men were engaged in a dangerous work. The next step is easy; that the people in the Life-Saving Service shall also be provided for. When we shall have taken that step we will be confronted with the proposition that the railway mail clerks endanger their lives on every trip they make.

And then these employees in the departments here in Washington who have worn out their lives, as they claim, in the service of the people will say that the Government should take care of them in their old age.

I see in the papers this morning that somebody is going to report favorably a bill providing for a retired pension list for the worn-out clerks.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I will say to the gentleman that I would not favor such a bill. Further, in response to the gentleman's suggestion about the revenue-cutter bill, I will say that that was not a civil pension bill. That provided for graduated pay and for retirement of the officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, I am perfectly familiar with the bill.

Mr. DAWSON. If the gentleman will allow me, I want to correct an erroneous statement that the gentleman made with regard to the bill which is proposed to be reported, to which he has just referred, relating to the clerks in the departments in Washington. Instead of being a civil pension bill, that is an annuity bill, not in the nature of a pension at all. It proposes that each individual clerk shall have set aside from his pay a sufficient sum to enable him on reaching a certain age to purchase an annuity.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I hope the gentleman will not retire from the arena until the battle is over. Does not the bill to which the gentleman refers provide that if this fund is found insufficient, it shall be supplemented by an appropriation from the Treasury?

Mr. DAWSON. Not necessarily.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. In other words, you have no fund upon which to start. The proposition is that these clerks shall pay a certain percentage of their salaries, which at 3½ per cent, compounded semiannually, would produce a certain annuity. But your bill provides that until this fund accumulates, it shall be supplemented by an appropriation from the Treasury. Is not that a fact?

Mr. DAWSON. The underlying principle of the bill is not to pension civil employees, but to compel them to provide an annuity against old age.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. A compulsory insurance company.

Mr. DAWSON. In effect, or rather a compulsory savings bank.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. By which the Government of the United States undertakes to borrow money at 3½ per cent, compounded semiannually. That is better than the insurance companies do for those of us who insure voluntarily. If the Government can borrow money at the rate of 2 per cent, and it installs an insurance department for government clerks at 3½ per cent compound interest, you may call it what you please, but it is the Treasury of the United States coming to the rescue of these people.

Now, to recur to the bill to which the gentleman from North Carolina refers. The vice in this bill is in the fact that while it is not called a civil-pension bill it is that in substance and in effect. If the members of the committee will examine the hearings before the subcommittee that made up this bill, they will find that it provides for a waiting list; that men who have been in the service for a certain length of time may be placed upon waiting orders. That is what the bill calls it, but it is in substance and effect a civil pension, and that fact was brought out in the hearings.

Mr. MANN. Which bill does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The bill to permit the enlisted men of the Revenue-Cutter Service to be placed upon waiting orders, which bill was passed at the first session of the Sixtieth Congress.

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman was talking about the bill now pending.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. The gentleman has taken a wide range in his speech.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I have a right to do so in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. The gentleman has discussed a civil-service pension list for the clerks in the departments, and he has discussed the Revenue-Cutter Service bill. The bill which I discussed before the committee was a bill to pension the employees of the Life-Saving Service. I explained to the gentleman that I favored the bill for the retirement of the officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service and to give them graduated pay.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I understand that perfectly.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I will say to the gentleman that I would be opposed to any civil-pension list; but so far as pensioning the men in the Life-Saving Service is concerned, I am for it, and expect to stand for it as long as I represent the State of North Carolina in Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That is exactly what I am complaining about—that the gentleman says he is opposed to a civil-pension list, and then he advocates it when called by some other name.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, this Life-Saving Service pension bill, I wish to say to the gentleman from South Carolina, provides for pensions, it is true, but it is not a civil-pension list. Such a list would include all government employees. The bill provides only that the men of the Life-Saving Service shall be placed on the retired list when incapacitated by reason of disability incurred in the line of duty in the service, and that they shall receive thereafter 75 per cent of the pay of the grade held by them at the time of disability. Their disability is to be passed upon by a board, and the proceedings and decisions of the board are to be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury for approval. The bill explains itself. I do not advocate a civil-pension list; and so far as the Revenue-Cutter Service pension bill is concerned, I have explained that fully.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from North Carolina that there is a bill to be reported by the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, favoring annuities for all government employees, which I think will cause the gentleman to change his mind completely on that subject.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I am not prepared to advocate a pension for clerks, but I am for this Life-Saving Service bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Not exceeding $10,500 of the unexpended balance of appropriations for establishing new life-saving stations and lifeboat stations on the sea and Lake coasts of the United States authorized by law, or so much as may be necessary, are hereby made immediately available for the construction of a life-saving station suitable for exhibition purposes on the grounds of the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the construction of this life-saving station has been expressly authorized by act of Congress. The only necessity for this legislation is that it was supposed by the Life-Saving Service that they could build this station out of their appropriation, but the accounting officer of the Treasury held that it would have to be built out of the appropriation for the exposition. Unfortunately, at the time the ruling was made by the accounting officer, the appropriation in control of the Supervising Architect for the exposition was exhausted.

Mr. MACON. Was there an obligation on the part of the Government under existing law to construct it?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No; I think the act expressly provided that the life-saving station should be provided——

Mr. MACON. And they used it for other purposes?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. In one sense the gentleman is correct, but I want to call attention to the fact that this exposition, unlike all other American expositions, has declined to ask any loan from the Government of the United States and has declined to ask the Government to participate at all in the ordinary sense of contributing generally to the exposition. All it has asked of the Government is to give a governmental exhibit. No other exposition has been conducted on that principle. Now, everybody who has attended any of these expositions realizes that this life-saving exhibit is of great interest to the average citizen, and to deprive them of this little portion of a show that was promised them in the act that was passed, by reason of a mere controversy over the accounting in the Treasury Department, when more enterprise has been displayed by this exposition company than any other in American history, it seems to me would be ungracious.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman says appeals to me in many ways. Since I have been a Member of Congress I have consistently and continuously voted against appropriations of money belonging to the whole people of the United States in order to furnish entertainment for a part of the people of the United States, and, I may say, to a very small percentage of them at that. Perhaps the great exposition that was celebrated at St. Louis called the "World's Fair" did not furnish entertainment for one-tenth of the population of the United States. That is my position on and reason for questioning and voting against appropriations of this sort. But since the gentleman from Iowa has said that this particular exposition company has in nowise attempted to beg or persuade the Government to give it anything in order to enable it to make a show for the people who can and will attend it, I am going to withdraw the point of order as a matter of encouragement for that kind of conduct upon the part of other organizations that want to give entertainments for the people in their respective communities. I withdraw the point of order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BURTON of Ohio having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 27054. An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 27523. An act making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

For labor and expenses of engraving and printing: For salaries of all necessary employees, other than plate printers and plate printers' assistants, $1,200,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no portion of this sum shall be expended for printing United States notes or Treasury notes of larger denomination than those that may be canceled or retired, except in so far as such printing may be necessary in executing the requirements of the act "To define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes," approved March 14, 1900.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to ask what the purpose of that provision is about not printing larger notes?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I will state that that provision has been carried for a great many years. Personally I think it might as well be dropped, but the gentleman is aware that at one time there was a belief in the country that small notes were better for the mass of people than large notes, and consequently at the time when that notion was very prevalent and in the fear that the Government would gradually get the money into such large notes that the average citizen could not get hold of any of it this provision was put in. I do not think it affects the actual circulation a particle now, but it has behind it its traditions, and I do not think it is wise to attempt to drop it out at this late day.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I am sorry to say that it does not cause me any personal inconvenience. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

American ethnology: For continuing ethnological researches among the American Indians and the natives of Hawaii, under the direction of the Smithsonian Institution, including salaries or compensation of all necessary employees and the purchase of necessary books and periodicals, $42,000, of which sum not exceeding $1,500 may be used for rent of building.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the chairman of this committee, or the gentleman in charge of the bill at this time, how long these researches are to be continued, and what good is being derived as a result of this annual expenditure?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I may say that as far as I am personally concerned I have often made the inquiry when these investigations would be ended and never have been able to obtain satisfactory light on that subject. As the gentleman is probably aware, the work of this bureau is largely the collection of the folk-lore of the Indians. In place of having exhausted the sources they claim that there is an abundance of material yet to be worked upon and are constantly demanding an increase of this appropriation and are constantly bringing upon the committee great pressure to secure such increase. It has only been by steadily standing out against the further expenditure of money in this direction that the committee has been able to keep the appropriation down approximately to what it has been in recent years.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question in connection with that item. Is it true or not true that there has been a tremendous growth in the ratio of salaried officials in the bureau that is conducting these investigations in proportion to the amount of work done?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not think so. My judgment is that that is not true.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then it is an exceptional bureau, is it not?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Well, I do not think there has been any growth in the salaries in this bureau, but they never get done with anything. That is my criticism.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I hope that that will not be done. A part of this work, I might say, if the gentleman will permit me, in further answer to his question, has only just been inaugurated—the part of the work in Colorado.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I am not disposed in making this motion to insist upon it if any justification can be shown for the appropriation, but in looking through the hearings held by the committee it seems to me that there is nothing but an endless amount of study by supposed scientists provided for of subjects in which there is very little general interest, and the results of which can be of very nominal value to anyone. Here, for instance, a special study has been made of the population of the Indians of the United States with a view to ascertaining whether the population is increasing or diminishing; whereas it is a notorious matter, time and time again published, that the population of the Indians is diminishing. We learn, furthermore, "that a small beginning has been made in studying the languages of the remnant of the tribes of the Middle West," but "owing to lack of funds it has not been possible to make much progress."

I suppose this appropriation is for the purpose of making more progress in the study of languages of the tribes that are rapidly disappearing, and I can see no possible benefit to come from such study, except to afford occupation to certain pseudo-scientific gentlemen. We are informed also in this report that "a beginning has been made in the study of the music of the Indians." Now, will the gentleman in charge of the bill inform the House what possible benefit can come to anybody, either in the government employ or in private life, by a study of the music of the Indians?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Music of the Indians and nearly all other music is entirely out of my sphere.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Did the gentleman ever hear any of this Indian music?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does he not think that it is very soothing to the troubled soul?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have heard a great deal of music which was both soothing and otherwise, but I do not believe in Uncle Sam paying for it or paying for the study of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am speaking of this particular Indian music. Does he not believe it desirable that it should be preserved for the benefit of humanity? [Laughter.]

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I notice, furthermore, that this ethnological bureau proposes to extend its researches to Hawaii and Samoa, and I believe later that it will be extended to the Philippine Islands, and be indefinitely extended.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit me a question? Do the hearings show that there is any appropriation to investigate ancient mythology or the Norse legends?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As far as I have proceeded in the matter I believe not, but I suppose when they have exhausted the more recent subjects of ethnology they will go on and take up the past so as to keep busy.

Mr. HARDY. Is there anything on the subject of the "fair god" of Mexico being investigated?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I believe there is a desire expressed to send an expedition to Mexico for some purpose. I notice also the tribe of Omaha Indians has been investigated. I might possibly have some sympathy with that, as I narrowly escaped being an Omaha myself. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this is one of those gingerbread appropriations in this bill which ought to be cut out, and unless the gentleman in charge of the bill can offer some good reason why this appropriation of $42,000 should be continued I shall ask for a vote.

Mr. DAWSON. If the gentleman will allow me, I notice in the hearings it is provided for an investigation up in the neighborhood of Salt River, which leads me to think that the appropriation should not be opposed on that side of the Chamber.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow another question——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. We have already been up there and know the conditions without expending any money to find out. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not think this provision ought to be stricken out. It is a scientific investigation, and while it seems to me it ought to advance more rapidly to completion than it has, I do not believe it ought to be suspended right in the midst of the work. My theory is that it ought to be finished up, and not stop it in an incomplete state. The second and final handbook of American Indians is not ready for deliverance——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would like to finish this sentence, but I will cheerfully yield even now.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the gentleman accept this amendment to the paragraph, "for completing ethnological researches" instead of "continuing?"

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would be very glad to accept the amendment if I felt any confidence that it would be completed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I believe it would if the gentleman would accept it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the handbook of languages has been printed. Now, I did not like this handbook of languages myself. It is known all over the State of Iowa that the word "Iowa" means "beautiful land." I picked up this book of languages and there found that the word "Iowa" means "sleepy ones," and I have not been satisfied in all respects with the work of this bureau from that day to this. Good progress has been made on the handbook of archæology, and it is believed that this work will be finished during the present year. The second and final part of the handbook of American Indians is not yet ready for delivery, but 250 pages have been printed, 200 more are practically ready for paging, and the proofs of the remainder are being read as rapidly as the nature of the work will permit and as one person can accomplish it. Steps have been taken during the year to record on maps the location of all Indian settlements existing or formerly having existed in the United States.

Now, this work is work in progress which has been carried on for many years, and I do not think it ought to be summarily stopped. I will say this, that last year we put the amount in the bill at $40,000; that in another body we found great difficulty in keeping it down to $42,000; and it was only after a considerable effort we prevented this appropriation being largely increased a year ago. It seems to me it will be idle to strike it out, and I therefore hope the amendment of the gentleman will not prevail.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the House I will amend my motion and, instead of striking out the paragraph, strike out the word "continue" and insert in lieu thereof the word "complete."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to withdraw his first amendment proposed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The gentleman now proposes an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 51, line 21, strike out the word "continue" and insert in lieu thereof the word "complete."

Mr. MANN. I hope that the amendment will not prevail. The work done by the Bureau of Ethnology is of great value. It is not practicable to finish the work now in hand within the next fiscal year. The most important work probably in hand now is in the nature of a dictionary or encyclopedia of information relating to the American Indian. A portion of that work has been published—one volume. It is probably the most exhaustive work on the subject of Indians that has ever been contemplated, and requires a considerable time to complete. The expense of it is not great, but will furnish when completed, in compact form, a reference library containing all of the knowledge concerning the Indian that there is. It will be of great value, I think, to anyone who studies or cares about the Indian question. As it seems to me, it would be a mistake, especially for that portion of the country that is much interested in the Indian question, to stop obtaining this information and the publication of it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is there any more reason for obtaining information of this sort than there is for the Government going into any field of exploitation or investigation? If this can be done, then we are justified in sending out expeditions to make these searches in archæology or in ancient history anywhere. There is no practical value to it.

Mr. MANN. There is a practical value in this, and this work that is now being carried on in the main is not original research. It is bringing together in compendium form the results of original research for many years, which, as it stands, probably is not of so much value except to particular students, but when this work is completed the gentleman will have in his possession a compact reference library concerning Indians which can not be obtained anywhere else, a public document of great value to everybody who wishes to refer or consult concerning Indians or Indian questions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the gentleman give any idea how many years more this appropriation is to be continued? I understand it has been in these sundry civil appropriation bills an indefinite number of years already.

Mr. MANN. For many years the Government has carried on the work of original research among Indians through the Smithsonian Institution. So far as the original-research work is concerned, my recollection is, and I would not undertake to be certain about being accurate in regard to it, that that work is practically completed. There has been talk about doing some work among the Hawaiians, although practically little work has been done there so far. This bill authorizes it. I think there has not been much done, and there would not be a great deal to do there, but the principal work of that bureau at present is preparing and arranging this compendium or encyclopedia of information concerning the Indians.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not only among the Hawaiians, but among the Samoans, and I suppose next year it will be among the Philippine Islanders, and then in Porto Rico.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may suppose, but the fact is, I may say to the gentleman, that the Filipino government is already conducting original research work along ethnological lines itself, so that we are not expected to go over there—an original research work of great volume.

I do not think it would be amiss for our Government, having possession of the Hawaiian Islands, having possession of one or more of the Samoan Islands, to have information published concerning the natives of those islands, who will soon disappear, so far as being in the aboriginal native condition is concerned. Who else will contribute that information to the world? But, of course, there will not be great expense so far as that information is concerned. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not any disposition, Mr. Chairman, to insist on the amendment if there is in the future any definite idea as to the ending of this seemingly endless appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, there is, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If it is approaching its conclusion, as the gentleman from Illinois assures us, I will withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Astrophysical Observatory: For maintenance of Astrophysical Observatory, under the direction of the Smithsonian Institution, including salaries of assistants, the purchase of necessary books and periodicals, apparatus, making necessary observations in high altitudes, repairs and alterations of buildings, and miscellaneous expenses, $13,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee what this Astrophysical Observatory is and what can be accomplished by it?

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will turn to page 340 of the hearings, he will there find a very exhaustive description not only of the Astrophysical Observatory, but also of the work that has been going on for a number of years by the men in charge of that institution.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that the Astrophysical Observatory was practically founded by Doctor Langley when he was Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution. Doctor Langley was admitted to be one of the foremost scientists in the world, and his special work was along the lines of the work carried on by the Astrophysical Observatory. I am not able myself to form an opinion as to the value of that work, but I will say to the gentleman, from information which has come to me as a Regent of the Smithsonian Institution, the work at the Astrophysical Observatory is considered in scientific circles to be of great value, and the work of this particular institution is considered of the highest value, not only for scientific research, but in the end for practical results.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to read to the committee some of the achievements of the Astrophysical Observatory as they appear to be chronicled on page 341 of the hearings before that committee. Mr. Abbot there testified before the committee. In speaking of the work of the Astrophysical Observatory, he tells of the striking examples of practical assistance which it has been to the people of the United States. For example, he says:

Aside from its scientific side, there is a gentleman named King who has recently published a little volume on the ventilation and lighting of houses and stables.

Now, I concede that if the Astrophysical Observatory authorities should publish a volume on the lighting and heating of houses, that might be of some practical value; but it did not. A private citizen was left to do that. This gentleman he names had recently published a little volume on the ventilation and lighting of stables. Then Mr. Abbot continues, in referring to this private citizen:

He quoted from our volume, and he wrote me a letter asking for information regarding the brightness of the sky, and whether a long window in a stable should be put in vertically or horizontally to let in the most light. He published in his book my letter in reply.

I regret to say that we are still living in doubt—we in the House of Representatives, who ought to know whether a window ought to be put in vertically or horizontally in order to furnish light to the horses in a stable.

Mr. MANN. Probably it would do the gentleman good to read the letter; then he would know.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me go to the second achievement, as told by Mr. Abbot:

Again, the gentleman in charge of the Carnegie Desert Laboratory at Tucson, Ariz., wrote to me some time ago and inquired as to the amount of radiation of the sun and of the sky which would fall upon the leaf of a plant if the leaf were horizontal; second, if that leaf were vertical. He required this information both for Tucson and for an elevation of 3,000 feet above Tucson. After getting from him more detailed information in regard to just what he wanted, and whether he wanted his vertical leaf to face north and south or east and west, and whether he wanted the data for one particular day of the year, and if for the whole sky and sun combined or for the sky alone, or for any particular color of rays, I was able to give him the information he required, and he wrote me that he believed no botanist had ever before had such information available to him for carrying on such work as he proposed to do.

I can easily imagine no botanist ever had such information or would know what to do with it if he had it.

Mr. MANN. I do not suppose the leaf has ever known one way or the other. Probably the leaf itself will never have scientific knowledge as to whether it requires more sunlight vertically or horizontally; but if left alone the leaf would discover probably whether one or the other was the better position for it. Now, the gentleman makes light of the question as to whether a window put in vertical or horizontal would give more light. The gentleman himself makes "light" of the subject, but he has no "light" upon the question. It would probably be of great value to him if he could obtain "light," either horizontal or vertical, upon this and many other questions. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Chairman, it is of great value in practical work to know whether more sunlight comes into a window in one shape or another shape. The gentleman may make light of the matter of shape. But in estimating the flow of water through a pipe the size of the hole of the pipe is not all that determines the amount of water that will pass through, but the shape of the hole has much to do with the question. So that the shape of the window may have much to do with the amount of sunlight that comes in; and this information is of practical value in many respects.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the preservation, exhibition, and increase of the collections from the surveying and exploring expeditions of the Government, and from other sources, including salaries or compensation of all necessary employees, and all other necessary expenses, $300,000, of which sum $5,500 may be used for necessary drawings and illustrations for publications of the National Museum.

Mr. GARRETT. I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee how many expeditions there are now out engaged in this Smithsonian work?

Mr. TAWNEY. Chiefly those under the jurisdiction of the Geological Survey; I do not know how many.

Mr. MANN. This item does not cover any of the cost of expeditions.

Mr. GARRETT. It says:

For continuing the preservation, exhibition, and increase of the collections from the surveying and exploring expeditions of the Government.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but it does not cover the cost of any expeditions.

Mr. GARRETT. Where are they covered?

Mr. MANN. These collections are made in various branches of the government service—the Geological Survey, the War Department, and various others.

Mr. TAWNEY. Principally the Geological Survey.

Mr. GARRETT. Are there any expeditions out under the Smithsonian now?

Mr. MANN. Once in a while there is one.

Mr. GARRETT. Is there not one going to Africa soon?

Mr. MANN. Yes. If that is what the gentleman wants to get at, I will be glad to give the information.

Mr. GARRETT. This is a matter concerning which many statements have been made, and it seems well to have the facts now. How much of the expense of the expedition which the President is to lead is to be paid by the Government?

Mr. MANN. No portion of the expense of the President's trip to Africa is to be paid out of any public fund. Last summer, after the President determined that he would make a trip to Africa upon the expiration of his presidential term, the President wrote to the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, stating that he intended to make a trip to Africa and that he thought he would have an opportunity of collecting a large number of specimens of kinds which might not be obtained in any other way; and I do not think he stated, but I suppose he assumed, from the fact that he would be an ex-President of the United States he might have better opportunities of collecting specimens, and he said he thought he ought to offer them to the Government through the Smithsonian Institution and the National Museum.

The matter was taken up by the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, and he determined that he had no public fund or appropriation out of which to pay the expenses. Thereupon he made a request to a number of gentlemen throughout the country, asking them if they were willing to contribute toward that expense, and in that way he has raised a fund of about $20,000 to cover all the expense, which fund has been contributed to the Smithsonian Institution for the purpose of paying, not the expenses of the President or his son, but the expenses of the gentlemen who go with the President to Africa. The Smithsonian Institution has engaged several scientific gentlemen to accompany the President, men who are expert in reference to the preservation and collection of specimens. They will go with the President on his trip to Africa, and when the President has finished his hunting trip there he will return by way of Egypt, as I understand, and the Smithsonian scientists will continue their work after the President has left, collecting both botanical and zoological specimens clear up to the Egyptian line. The expense of all of that, so far as the scientists employed by the Smithsonian are concerned, will be paid out of private contributions made to the Smithsonian for that purpose, and the President will pay the expenses of himself and his party, as distinguished from those whom the Smithsonian send along with him.

Mr. GARRETT. I will say to the gentleman that the information which he has given is the information which I had received; but I thought it quite proper here, in view of the many published statements and the confusion that seems to exist about it, to have an express and explicit statement, such as he has made, to go into the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Whatever criticism gentlemen may at times feel like leveling against the President on other matters, in my opinion there has been, in this matter, nothing in the action of President Roosevelt which can be criticised in anywise whatever. On the contrary, in the hope that he might be able to contribute more or less to the scientific information of our Government and to the great National Museum which we have, while he might have given those specimens to many other museums in the country, he has reserved what he expects to collect for the benefit of the Government of the United States through its National Museum. [Applause.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The information that we get through the press is usually interesting, but not always accurate, and I am like the gentleman from Tennessee—in order to have a positive, clear statement made about some of the matters, such as we have just had by the gentleman from Illinois, I want to say that there is another matter that I would like to know about.

An officer of the United States Army was retired, I believe, promoted and retired, and ordinarily would go upon three-quarters pay. It was stated at the time of the retirement that after the 4th of March he would accompany a distinguished citizen of the United States on a trip as his physician. Now, by what authority was he ordered to do that, if he was ordered to do it, and is he to receive the usual full pay given a retired officer engaged in active service, and is it to be paid out of the Treasury, if he is to receive full pay, or is the additional 33⅓ per cent contributed also by a generous, benevolent institution?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am not able to say. My understanding is that if any such officer accompanies the President he is not to be paid by the Smithsonian Institution. As to whether such an officer is to accompany the President and receive full pay I do not know. The distinguished gentleman who has asked me the question is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. I recently propounded the same conundrum to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in the House, and was unable to obtain the information which the gentleman now seeks to obtain from me. I take it that it is a newspaper error, because I do not understand how it could be possible for the War Department to order a retired officer to be paid full pay simply because he was to accompany a private citizen, no matter how eminent that private citizen might be, upon a journey.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman is quite right. I do not think the War Department would have authority to do it; but it was stated that it had been done, and that is why I asked the question.

Mr. MANN. It was so stated in the newspapers, and while the newspapers do the best they can, they occasionally make mistakes.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me to make a statement in his time?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand officially that the officer to whom the gentleman has referred will draw his usual retired officer's pay while he is abroad. The only thing he has asked is permission to be absent from the United States during that time. To some degree these retired officers are subject to orders from the War Department, but that he is ordered away is not true, as I understand.

Mr. MANN. I have no reason to doubt that that is the case.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase of books, pamphlets, and periodicals for reference in the National Museum, $2,000.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman whether these are pamphlets and guidebooks that are sold at the museum?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; they are not.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. They are distributed?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; these are books purchased by the institution for use in the office.

The Clerk read as follows:

For moving collections, furniture, and other property of the National Museum in connection with the occupancy of the new building for the National Museum, including all expenses incidental thereto, to be immediately available, $4,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the chairman of the committee tell me whether this provision will vacate the long room that was talked about as the art gallery during the last session of Congress—the "lecture room," as it was then called?

Mr. MANN. The long room is not a part of the museum; that is in the Smithsonian Institution, and it was designed at one time to make that interior part into a gallery of art. The present intention, I think, is to put an elevator in that part of the institution and cut those rooms up into working rooms of some sort, unless it should be determined to treat them otherwise.

There is a large room which would be available for the beginning of a gallery of art, and last year it was asked that an appropriation be made for the purpose of converting that room into an art gallery, but the appropriation was not made.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I looked that matter up to some extent. Mr. Walcott called my attention to the fact that Congress had made appropriations for altering and repairing that room in that part of the building several times. I want to know whether the gentleman from Illinois is sure that, as a matter of fact, the building does not, to all intents and purposes, belong to the Government.

Mr. MANN. The Smithsonian building?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Congress has repaired it a dozen times within the last twenty years.

Mr. MANN. The Smithsonian building belongs to the Smithsonian Institution. It is true that Congress sometimes appropriates money for caring for the building in some way, which Congress can do, and which the Smithsonian Institution would not be able to do out of its fund. A large share of the funds used by the Smithsonian Institution are contributed by Congress through its appropriations. The fund of the Smithsonian Institution amounts to in the neighborhood of $900,000, which is in the Treasury of the United States, and upon which the Government pays 5 per cent interest.

Mr. DOUGLAS. What I was anxious to know, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman could say, was whether there was any movement on the behalf of the trustees of the Smithsonian Institution to convert that room into a gallery at their own expense or in any way to utilize the collection which is already in the hands of the Government.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think I am safe in saying that there is no expectation of doing that out of the funds of the Smithsonian, which would be utterly inadequate, so far as the permanent income is concerned, for that purpose. Last year the Board of Regents passed a resolution in reference to the matter, and asked for an appropriation for that purpose, which was not allowed. Personally, I may say to the gentleman, I did not partake in the movement. It did not seem to me advisable to attempt to establish a gallery of art in that room.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To further enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce compliance with section 20 of the act to regulate commerce as amended by the act approved June 29, 1906, including the employment of necessary special agents or examiners, the unused and unexpended balance, not exceeding $225,000, of the appropriation of $350,000 made for this purpose for the fiscal year 1909, remaining unexpended at the close of that fiscal year is hereby reappropriated for expenditure during the fiscal year 1910, together with the further sum of $125,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 55, strike out all, beginning with line 10 and extending to and including the words "sum of," in line 16, the language proposed to be stricken out being:

"The unused and unexpended balance, not exceeding $225,000, of the appropriation of $350,000 made for this purpose for the fiscal year 1909, remaining unexpended at the close of that fiscal year is hereby reappropriated for expenditure during the fiscal year 1910, together with the sum of."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the items of the bill on which I am not in accord with the committee. The provision in the bill as reported will make available for the next fiscal year $350,000 to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to make the investigation which it is supposed is required by section 20 of the Hepburn Act. If the amendment offered by me is agreed to it will make available $125,000. This particular paragraph was the subject of considerable discussion in the last session of Congress. The Interstate Commerce Commission originally submitted an estimate of $750,000 for the present fiscal year to make the investigations authorized by section 20 of the Hepburn Act. In a communication to the Congress and in the investigations before the committee, they stated that they probably could do the work with $500,000, because it would be impossible properly to organize the force during this year. Later the commission stated that if it had $350,000 that amount would be sufficient for the purpose during this fiscal year.

The Committee on Appropriations, after a careful investigation, reported an appropriation of $50,000. The House, under the lead of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], increased the amount to $350,000.

Mr. Chairman, the record shows, and I believe that any candid man will admit, that the judgment of the committee was accurate, and that those who insisted upon the larger appropriation had not given that consideration essential to so important a matter, or else that their judgment was not as sound as that of the committee. In the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations this year it appears that up to the 31st day of January of this year the amount expended out of this appropriation was $41,534.14. There are now employed under this appropriation 34 men. Twelve of these men were formerly employed and paid out of a different appropriation. Five thousand five hundred and fifty-nine dollars is the maximum sum that has been expended during any month in this fiscal year, and if as much as $6,000 a month be expended during the balance of the year, not more than $72,000 can possibly be expended during the present fiscal year. Under the circumstances I am convinced that the commission will not require $350,000 for the next fiscal year, but that $125,000 will be ample.

I wish at this time, Mr. Chairman, to call the attention of the committee to the fact that those who do not investigate these questions are easily misled, and sometimes grow overenthusiastic about subjects with which they have no familiarity. It is not my custom to discuss or to comment upon statements contained in the private correspondence between gentlemen, but when a letter from one gentleman to another, somewhat confidential in its character, or considered so, is thereafter made the part of a public record and is used to bolster up the contention of one of the persons, I believe it to be proper to discuss the contents of the letter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I have here the letter sent by the President to the Speaker under date of April 30, 1908. It was sent by the President to the House recently as an appendix to one of his messages. I wish to read this letter:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., April 30, 1908.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is one matter connected with the sundry civil bill to which I should call your special attention, and that is the cutting down of the appropriation asked for by the Interstate Commerce Commission to carry into effect the twentieth section of the Hepburn law to only $50,000. In accordance with the request of the Committee on Appropriations, in carrying out the desire of the leaders of the House, the Interstate Commerce Commission, instead of asking, as they originally asked, for $500,000, which was the amount necessary in order to do the best work in carrying out the twentieth section, cut down the request to $350,000, the very minimum under which the work can be done effectively at all.

To provide only $50,000 really amounts to making a sham appropriation. It would be better to repeal the twentieth section or suspend its operation for a year, for such a course would have the merit of frankness. I regard this twentieth section as containing one of the most important provisions of the Hepburn Act, and to refuse to provide means for carrying it on is equivalent to repealing for this year that section, and it would undoubtedly be so understood by the country at large. I feel that the Hepburn Act was one of the great pieces of legislation for which Congress, under your direction and guidance, has been responsible, and for which it has received such deserved credit.

It would be from every standpoint a very real misfortune now to nullify one of the important provisions of that act. The only people benefited would be the very worst of the big railroad men whose misdeeds we are trying to prevent or correct. The commission has been at work with the railroads for two years preparing to put this section into execution through the means of a board of examiners. To refuse to give them $350,000 (for to appropriate $50,000 serves no purpose whatever) is to nullify completely these two years' work.

Very sincerely, yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. Chairman, I differed from the President in the opinions he expressed in this letter when it was written; I do not agree with them now. It is impossible for me to believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission has not used this great appropriation through a desire to help the very worst criminals among the big railroad men. I can not believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission refused to use this appropriation because the commission wished practically to repeal the law for a single year.

I can not believe that the commission only wished to use what the President considered would be a "sham" appropriation, worse than no appropriation whatever for this purpose. I am still of the opinion which I had when I joined in the recommendation of an appropriation of $50,000, that the men who asked the larger appropriation had not properly considered the matter, and that it would not be possible under any circumstances to use much more than $50,000 this year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may have five minutes more time.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from New York may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Did not the statistics in the hearings show that the commission will spend at least $70,000 this year, and as the appropriation proposed last year was only $50,000——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have already said that, taking the amount of $6,000 as the average amount spent during each month, the commission would not spend more than $72,000 this year.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, that also includes the salary of 12 men——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was about to state that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Who at the time this appropriation was passed were paid out of another appropriation, and were to continue to receive their compensation out of the other appropriation during the current fiscal year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What I have in mind, though, Mr. Chairman, is not so much whether the Interstate Commerce Commission could spend $20,000 more or less than the committee believed, but what I wish to call sharply to the attention of the country is the unfortunate language used by the President in characterizing the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations. It was universally believed that the President had charged and had actually meant that this committee in the discharge of its duties was not anxious to have the law enforced, but was making a recommendation that would prevent the law being enforced, and that would enable criminals to get the benefit of the operations of the law.

Mr. HARRISON. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the gentleman believe from the context of the President's letter that he thinks that, had he had the $350,000 appropriation in the past, it might possibly have led to the conviction of such a supposed criminal as Mr. Paul Morton?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I do not know about that. What I am calling attention to is that the President said that $50,000 would be a "sham" appropriation; that it would be better to repeal the law than to make such an appropriation; and yet the commission, with $350,000 at its disposal, the minimum amount that it asserted it could possibly properly use in the work outlined, has been unable even by the most strenuous efforts to expend at a rate in excess of $72,000 in this year.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In one minute; I just wish to make a few statements. This merely emphasizes the fact that no one man, be he in the executive department of the Government or be he in the legislative department of the Government, has been so divinely constituted that he possesses all the wisdom and all the knowledge that man can possess.

There are many men who disagree with me about the President in some things. I believe that there are many very desirable attributes possessed by him. In some respects he has been a very remarkable and useful President; I believe that in other respects he has done many things that properly received the condemnation of those who stand here as representatives of the people. I believe now, considering the use to which this letter to the Speaker has been put, the use to which it was put in connection with another matter resulting in a sharp controversy between the House and the President, that either the President or somebody in his behalf should acknowledge the grave mistake which was made not only by the Interstate Commerce Commission, not only by its very enthusiastic friends, but by those who insisted that the appropriation recommended by the committee should be increased from $50,000 to $350,000. Suppose the committee had accepted the recommendation of the Interstate Commerce Commission and had appropriated the amount originally asked—$750,000—the amount which, it is stated in House document 802, was imperative to conduct this work, how absurd such action would have been.

Let me read what was said in the commission's request:

After a careful consideration of the whole matter, it is the judgment of the commission that at the end of the next fiscal year—

That is, this fiscal year—

a thoroughly equipped and well-organized board of examiners will require an expenditure at a rate of not less than $750,000 a year.

They can not expend at the rate of 10 per cent of that amount. Later, they reduced the amount to $500,000 because they said that by January or February, 1909, the force could not be properly organized. To quote their language—

Therefore that an appropriation of $500,000 for the next fiscal year—

Meaning this fiscal year—

will satisfy our requirements; but, as we understand the matter, at least that sum will be required if the work is to be prosecuted on the broad and effective lines desired by the commission and contemplated by the act and by the general public.

They were given $350,000. They will not expend over $72,000 this year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much have they spent?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have spent, up to the 31st day of January, $41,534.14. I repeat that the commission was unwarranted in making its recommendation. The President was unjustified in stating what he did in his letter to the Speaker, and the wisdom of the committee has been amply justified by what has transpired since. I hope that the committee will not be overawed by the fear of things that may happen, but will adopt this amendment and give this commission $125,000, as I propose, for the next fiscal year, which will, in my judgment, be ample for all that can be done by the commission.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a good deal of interest, and, I must say, with a good deal of surprise, to the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], when attempting to state what occurred on this floor during the last session of Congress and the reasons that were given at that time by the commission for asking for $350,000, and by gentlemen on the floor who favored an increase of the amount from $50,000 to $350,000. The main argument that was made at that time by some of the gentlemen—and I take it that the gentleman from New York himself was one of them—was that money ought not to be expended for the purposes for which myself and other gentlemen on this floor claimed the money should be used. It was well understood at that time that the commission was arranging for a set of experts to properly perform the work which the commission wanted done; and it is absolutely true, as stated by the gentleman from New York, that when they had their full force properly equipped it would require at least $350,000.

Now, the fact of the matter is that they have not been able during the year up to date to acquire all of the men that they wanted. They still have in mind the notion of carrying out the provisions, as they understand the provisions, of the interstate-commerce law, of determining whether the railroads of the country are complying with the provisions and regulations set forth by the commission; and they have been busy in formulating methods for keeping books and accounts of the railroads, and are now anxious to put those methods into effect.

I had supposed, Mr. Chairman, that this matter was settled by the Committee on Appropriations. I had understood that members of the Interstate Commerce Commission had asked for a hearing before the committee for the purpose of setting forth the reasons why this appropriation should be no less for the coming year than it has been in the past.

I understand that it believes it can obtain the right number of men for the purposes of carrying out the most important provision, as I maintain, of the interstate-commerce law.

Now, I submit it would have been a serious mistake last summer for this Congress to have adopted a provision appropriating $50,000, provided the commission had been able to obtain a sufficient number of men for carrying into effect the provisions of the law. I said then, as I say now, that we passed this law, we provided for certain things to be done under the law, and I propose so far as it within me lies to say to that commission: "You shall have all the means you require for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of the law, and you shall not be able to make the excuse that the Congress failed to appropriate sufficient money for that purpose."

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me to be unfortunate that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] should bring this up in this way. No one claimed that it would require $350,000 unless the requisite number of skilled men could be obtained.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will ask the gentleman if he did not himself say a year ago, and I am now quoting from the RECORD, this?—

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman state how many men they contemplate employing in this service?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The original proposition was 285 when the quota is full. They have now 161 men, as I remember it, men who have passed the civil-service examination and are qualified at this time to take up the work and commence operations under the provisions of this act.

While, as a matter of fact, they have only 34 men employed now?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not wish to dispute the RECORD, but my understanding of the situation at that time was, and it is my understanding now, that I did state that 165 men—it was my intention to say that, at least—or a number of men had been examined, and only a small proportion of them had met the qualifications and passed the examination.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Michigan be given five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But, gentlemen, this is a question for us to decide now. We are not going to spend $350,000 unless the commission obtains qualified men to carry out this work, and unless they do get them the money will remain in the Treasury.

Now, I for one want the commission to have all the authority and all the means possible for carrying out the twentieth section of the law, and I submit it would be a mistake if we did not do this. I am sorry that there was no hearing before the Committee on Appropriations on this subject, but I think the chairman of the committee will assent when I say that members of that commission—Mr. Harlan and, I think, the statistician—went before him to inquire if they wanted hearings on this subject, and were informed that the Appropriations Committee was going to report the same amount as last session.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would say to the gentleman from Michigan I did not see Mr. Harlan, but the disbursing officer of the commission was before us, and I interrogated him in regard to both the estimate for the fiscal year and the appropriation for the current fiscal year.

Mr. Knapp was also present at a later hearing, but the subject was not gone into, for the reason that the committee, after considering it, had decided, without any reference to what had passed last year, to carry the amount substantially as we had carried it in the current law, at $350,000, and that understanding has been had on the subject.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then that was my understanding in the matter, and therefore I had taken no pains myself to go into it and did not think there was any division of opinion upon it.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will add that, subsequent to that time, I had a conversation with Mr. Adams on the matter, and at his request the chairman of the commission wrote a letter to me explaining the matter, which I shall put in the RECORD if I have an opportunity to address the committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understand the chairman of the committee is in favor of this provision for $350,000?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am.

Mr. SHERLEY. If I understand the reason of putting this in at the full $350,000, it was because it would be possible to get the full force now; and that was not true a year ago.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That has subsequently been proven to be the fact.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it not a fact that a year ago you had read to the Committee of the Whole, in consideration of this matter, a statement of the commissioners that for two years they had been at work on this matter and were then ready to institute the full force, and all they needed was the money?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I stated a year ago that it would take some time to institute the full force.

Mr. SHERLEY. Did you not have this letter read?—

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, April 29, 1908.

MY DEAR MR. TOWNSEND: So far as I am aware, every member of the commission is heartily in favor of the appropriation asked for effective administration of the twentieth section of the act, and I am sure there will be extreme disappointment if the appropriation is not made.

For nearly two years we have been planning this work under the able direction of Professor Adams, and we shall be ready to carry it on efficiently just as soon as the money is provided. The uniform system of keeping accounts was put in force on July 1, 1907, and the examination and inspection of these accounts should begin with the next fiscal year. To withhold the needed appropriation would disarrange all our affairs in this regard and postpone the commencement of a most important branch of our work. The machinery is ready, the men are available, and all that is needed for efficient and useful service is the necessary means for defraying the expense. I sincerely hope you may be able to secure an increase of the item in question to the $350,000 which the commission believes to be the smallest sum that will carry on this work during the next year.

Yours, very truly, MARTIN A. KNAPP,
Chairman.

That brings me to this proposition: Was not the whole contention between the gentleman and the Committee on Appropriations the question of whether the amount of money asked for could be used; and are not the facts, as shown by the year's work, this: That the committee missed it by about $20,000 and you gentlemen by nearly $200,000?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I submit it was not a question between the gentleman and the committee as to whether the commission could spend that money.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have the record.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The complete record will show that the gentleman contended, and he had the right to do it, that it was an improper thing to do to spend that money.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, if the gentleman will yield further. I called attention to the value of this kind of work. Speaking from the personal experience that I had in the reorganization of the Monon Railroad, I was in favor of it, but did not believe they needed the large sum asked, and subsequent facts established that they did not need the amount.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not remember that the gentleman had made that suggestion.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think if the gentleman will refresh his recollection he will find several things that will come to him as having occurred.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I never contended that this was an improper method of expending the money. I did not agree with some as to the advisability of entering as extensively on this plan as some who advocated it, and I did not believe that the commission could use as much money as it asked.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think the gentleman is correct about that. I think it was true that he did not have any sympathy with that. I believe that the RECORD of last session will disclose that the principal argument of some gentlemen against my amendment increasing the amount was that the law did not contemplate the work laid out by the commission in reference to its construction of the twentieth section of the law. It was not the principal question whether the commission could spend the additional appropriation, but, rather, ought it to do so?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has the commission been prevented by injunctions from undertaking anything which they proposed to do?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Not at all. The only thing I had heard prior to to-day about this appropriation was that the committee was agreed upon it, and, believing this, I have not gone into the reasons which actuated the commission in asking for it. But this I do know, in talking with members of the commission from time to time, and especially with Professor Adams, who has had charge of this matter, that he has not been able to get the men that the commission felt were properly fitted for this particular work, and therefore the commission have not spent the money. Their plans have not been completed as they expected a year ago.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No one has been hurt.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Not a bit.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The Government has not been hurt.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Not a bit.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The taxpayers have not been hurt.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Not a dollar.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And no criminals have been hurt. [Laughter.] Now, the gentleman knows that I voted with him on his proposition, and I stand here to defend it, and I am going to defend it before we get away from it; but I still do not understand why the commission wanted $750,000 and then fell to $500,000, and the committee reported $50,000, and the President asked for $350,000. Now, that is jumping some.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And then it turned out that the commission can not use over $72,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, I do not see why we should make a big scarecrow of this, because nobody guessed correctly, perhaps.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The committee guessed right.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Can the gentleman inform the committee whether or not the Interstate Commerce Commission is now prepared to expend the $350,000 on this work for the coming year?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The only information I have is from a conversation with Professor Adams, and a letter from him and a letter from a commissioner, in which they state that it is very important that they have this appropriation, that the $350,000 be made good—that is, that the unexpended balance of last year be reappropriated, and a sufficient amount to carry it up to $350,000 be appropriated, as they believe that they are now going to be in a position to carry out their plans. The two years to which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] refers as having been mentioned in the letter to me by Chairman Knapp were the two years spent in perfecting a plan for the railroads of this country to adopt for keeping their accounts. Trained men were to be employed for the purpose of seeing that the carriers complied with those conditions, that they were properly installed, and that the law was carried out in that respect.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Can the gentleman inform the committee as to whether or not the commission have perfected that plan and are ready to put this experiment to work?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not talked with them directly on that, and only know that they ask that this amount be appropriated.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I again call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the letter states that the machinery is ready, that the men are available; and I have just been informed—I speak only on information—that the commission notified a Member of this House, who inquired some months ago, that they had a waiting list of some 60 or more eligibles for these positions. Can the gentleman inform the House as to that?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No, sir; I can not. I do not care to talk about matters stated to be on information, as far as that is concerned. I do not think anybody questions the fact that the commissioners are proceeding, at least, in good faith; that they are doing the best they can.

I do not believe they would ask for $350,000 if they did not believe they could spend it along the lines for which it was appropriated. If they had any design on it, they would have spent it last year when that amount was appropriated; but because they could not complete their force, and did not make the arrangements as they expected to make them, they did not spend the money. They are now asking the Congress to appropriate $350,000 to carry out the provisions of the twentieth section. Whether they will do it or not, I do not know. I would have known more about this if I had not supposed that the matter was settled to the entire satisfaction of the Committee on Appropriations. As I understand, it is settled so far as the chairman of the committee is concerned.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman will not confuse the committee with the chairman, as important a factor as he is.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; I will not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me ask the gentleman. My opinion is that the commission can not use more than $125,000 the next year. I base that on the experience of the past.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that the time of the gentleman from Michigan be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let me ask this question of the gentleman from New York: If there is nothing wrong with the commission except, perhaps, in its judgment—that it is asking for more than it can use—does not the gentleman think that it would be better for us to appropriate this amount of money, which we know will not be used unless it can be properly used, rather than have Congress take the position of blocking the enforcement of that legislation and make it possible for the commission, if it fails, to say that it failed because Congress did not give it money enough to carry out the provisions of the law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me suggest to the gentleman that that will not follow, because Congress will convene in December. The commission will have $125,000 to use between the 1st of July and the 1st of December. If then the commission is able to show that it will need more money, there will not be the slightest difficulty in obtaining it; while if we adopt the theory of the gentleman from Michigan, simply because we believe different officials are well-meaning and intend to carry out the law, of appropriating all they ask for, all the money that ever was in the Treasury would not be sufficient to supply their imaginary wants.

Mr. TOWNSEND. This is a different proposition than the ordinary one. If the commission had not been engaged for, lo, these several years in preparing a system which they say now, even as they said a year ago, they are prepared to carry out, it might be different; but I submit, Mr. Chairman, that we can better afford in this particular instance to grant what the commission has asked for, and especially as we do not have the full hearings on this particular subject, which would set forth just exactly the reasons the commission had for asking for this appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman says we have not the full hearings.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let me say why I make that statement. I understand the gentleman from Minnesota has agreed to that proposition. I was informed by a member of the commission, and by the statistician, that they had been to the committee, or to the chairman of it, or to somebody who was authorized to speak, and asked if the committee wanted further hearings on this subject; that they wanted this appropriation, and were prepared to give their reasons for it, and were informed that there would be a provision in the bill which would reappropriate the unexpended balance of last year and enough more to make it $350,000.

Now, I am sorry I did not know that the matter was coming up or I would have been fortified by the very facts which the gentlemen ask; but, assuming that the thing was settled, I did not go into the matter any further, and have not provided myself with the reasons that the commission had for asking for $350,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me suggest that many things are settled in the committee not entirely to my satisfaction. I took the statement made by the commission last year. They made a statement that they would imperatively need $750,000, and then $500,000, and then, at the very least, $350,000. I examined the reasons with great care, and then they came before the committee this year and showed that up to the 31st of January they had only expended $41,000, and the expense for the entire year would not be over $72,000. I was asked then if I desired any further information, and I said "No;" this information satisfied me that I could draw just as accurate conclusions as to what they might possibly need as if they lectured on academic questions for a week before the committee. I thought the experience of the past was of more importance than their academic discussion.

I feel convinced now that if we give them $350,000 the commission can not possibly use it next year, and I am opposed to placing at the disposal of any department more money than it can properly utilize in its work.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to occupy any more of the committee's time at present. I possibly shall ask to be heard if there are any more arguments in favor of the amendment aside from those presented, for the reason that this comes in a way of a surprise now. Perhaps it ought not to; perhaps it is not a good excuse that I am not prepared to meet the arguments that are presented here, or that might be presented, because I had not thought that it was coming up.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to say to the gentleman that I did not wish to take him by surprise, and that I informed the other members of the committee of my position on this matter.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will not prevail. As far as I am able, I shall endeavor to retain the provision carrying this appropriation in the form, as well as in the amount, that the committee has reported it. I am satisfied that the commission during the next fiscal year in all probability will not be able to obtain a sufficient corps of examiners to require the expenditure of all this appropriation, but nevertheless it is my desire that the commission should have all the money necessary for the enforcement of this particular section of the Hepburn law. I was satisfied a year ago, when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] assailed the Committee on Appropriations for recommending $50,000 for the purpose of carrying out section 20 of the Hepburn Act, and charged that we were attempting to throttle the execution of that act, that we had recommended the appropriation of all the money the commission could use in that service, at least until the next session of Congress.

The commission, I am glad to say, proceeded in the organization of the force for this purpose along the same lines the Committee on Appropriations supposed and proposed that they should, and as the result of their desire and effort to find competent men for the service, at the end of the first seven months of this fiscal year we now find they were able to expend only a little over $41,000 of the $350,000 we appropriated, under the fear on the part of many Members occasioned by the charge that the Committee on Appropriations, in recommending the appropriation of only $50,000 was endeavoring to cripple the administration of the interstate-commerce law.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I would like to know whether, if these 12 men who were employed by the commission previously as examiners in the service of the commission, and paid from another fund, had been continued as they were, or paid as they had been, the $50,000 would have covered the expenses and compensation of the examiners for the year?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; and more than covered it. Mr. Chairman, it was the understanding at that time that the 12 examiners, who were then employed and paid out of the general appropriation for the Interstate Commerce Commission, would continue to receive their compensation out of that appropriation, and that the $50,000 was for the compensation and expenses of the new or additional examiners. As to the purpose of the committee as expressed by me at that time, I want to read just two paragraphs contained in the remarks I made at that time:

> The committee has proceeded upon the theory that the commission can not at this time use the maximum amounts it estimates will ultimately be required to give them the service they desire. We have therefore proceeded slowly as we gained information from experience as to the necessities of the service, and not otherwise. It is for that reason the committee has recommended what we think will be ample to provide for all the inspection required for the next six months, when Congress will again be in session, and when, if the experience of the commission shows that more money is needed, more money will be appropriated.

The $50,000, Mr. Chairman, was not alone for new men, but it was recommended at that time with the understanding that the commission itself did not know definitely and had no accurate information as to the amount of money that would be necessary for this new service. Then I added, in another paragraph:

> The amount carried in this bill is not because of any antipathy to, or any desire on the part of, any member of the committee to cripple or impair or hamper the administration of the law in any way, but we do not want to rush in blindly and appropriate at the beginning more than is necessary for this service, for we know the amount can never be reduced.

Mr. Chairman, it was in line with the policy of the Committee on Appropriations that the commission began the administration of this appropriation. It is greatly to the credit of the commission that although it had more money than was necessary it did not allow that fact to influence it into making unnecessary or extravagant expenditures for this service. During the time of the hearings on this bill the chief statistician did call on me and explained why they were unable to employ more men than had been employed thus far during this fiscal year. It was because of the fact, as he explained, that they could not under the civil-service regulations obtain competent men.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that the Interstate Commerce Commission will administer this appropriation the coming fiscal year with the utmost economy; that it will secure only the most efficient and competent men for this service. I do not think the commission will need or can expend in the next fiscal year the $350,000 which this bill carries; but if they do or can, I am perfectly willing that they shall have the full amount which they now estimate can be expended. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I hope that this amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will not prevail.

I want to say that in reappropriating the $225,000 of the unexpended balance of the current appropriation, it is done more for the purpose of emphasizing the fact that when we were inaugurating this new service no individual Member of the House or anyone else could determine with any degree of accuracy the amount that would be required for that service, and that therefore they were not justified in impugning the motives of those who differed with them. It is also reappropriated for the purpose of emphasizing the fact that the charge made upon this floor, and the charge that has been made ever since in certain newspapers of this country, that the Committee on Appropriations in recommending all the commission has expended was attempting to throttle the execution of the interstate-commerce act was absolutely and unqualifiedly false. Our experience now demonstrates the fact with a balance at the end of this fiscal year of at least $225,000 or $250,000 unexpended from this appropriation, that there was no intention on the part of the Committee on Appropriations nor on the part of those who voted to sustain the committee to cripple or in any way interfere with the execution of the interstate-commerce act.

Mr. Chairman, not only myself, but nearly every member of the Committee on Appropriations during the past year has been severely criticised in the public press for reporting an appropriation of only $50,000 for this service, which now appears to have been more than the commission can expend in this fiscal year in executing section 20 of the Hepburn Act, had the 12 employees or examiners remained under the general appropriation, as it was then intended they should do, and had they not been transferred to the appropriation of $350,000 on the 1st of last July, when this appropriation became available. Instead of there being 162 men ready to enter this service a year ago, as was stated upon this floor by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], the commission did not have a man ready to enter the service when the appropriation was made, and in the first month after this appropriation became available they added only 8 men to the 12 then employed. If gentlemen will refer to the hearings, on page 592, you will there see a complete statement of the expenditures by months, the amount expended for compensation, expenses, and also of the number of special agents or examiners.

In the month of July they had 20, just 8 more than they had when this appropriation was made in May. In the month of August they had 20, in the month of September they had 24, in the month of October they had 32, in the month of November they had 33, in the month of December 35, and in the month of January 1 less, or 34. So that, Mr. Chairman, the criticism of the committee, either here or elsewhere, on account of our having recommended $50,000 for this service during the first six months of this fiscal year was absolutely without justification in fact or in reason. In the light of our experience it is now proven that those who charged that the recommendation of the committee was a mere sham and was evidence of an intent on our part to destroy the effect of the interstate-commerce act was made either through ignorance or malice.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in regard to the hearings on this estimate at this session, as I said before, Professor Adams, the statistician of the commission, called on me.

I told him I did not think it would be necessary to have any hearings on the proposition other than what we did have and what he told me personally, and that was it was impossible for them to get men under the civil-service regulations who were competent to perform the high grade of service required in the enforcement of this section, but that at the present time, by some arrangement—I do not now pretend to quote what Mr. Adams said, but my impression is that by excepting these places from the civil-service regulations they were either now or expected in the near future to obtain more competent men for the performance of this service. Thereafter the chairman of the commission, Mr. Knapp, in a letter addressed to me February 9, says:

> MY DEAR MR. TAWNEY: Mr. Adams found it necessary to leave somewhat unexpectedly for the West on Sunday, and therefore was not able to tell me personally of the interview that he had with you on Saturday. Indirectly I understand that your suggestion to him was to reappropriate for the coming fiscal year $250,000 from the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $350,000 for this fiscal year to "further enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce compliance with section 20 of the act to regulate commerce" and make a new appropriation of $100,000, so that for the coming year there will be available the sum of $350,000 for that branch of our work, which is the same amount appropriated for the current year.
> I understood that you were expecting some response from Mr. Adams to that suggestion. I therefore write to say for the commission that it is probable we shall expend $125,000 of the $350,000 appropriated for the present year. The unexpended balance that can be reappropriated will therefore not exceed $225,000. The commission sees no objection to making the appropriation in the form suggested, reappropriating the unexpended balance of $225,000 and making a new appropriation of $125,000, so that the full $350,000 will be made available for the coming fiscal year. There will be required for the next year at least $350,000 for this branch of the service.
> Very sincerely, yours, MARTIN A. KNAPP, Chairman.

In the light of what transpired on this floor when it was proposed to increase the appropriation from $50,000 to $350,000, and in view of the statements which were then made and have since been made regarding the motive that prompted the Committee on Appropriations to recommend $50,000 for this service this year, this admission on the part of the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission that Congress at its last session appropriated at least $225,000 more than was necessary for this purpose ought to satisfy any sane man of the falsity of the charges made against the Committee on Appropriations or any member of that committee. This admission is also a tribute to the judgment of those who in this House voted against the appropriation of more money than the Interstate Commerce Commission could expend during the current fiscal year for this service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I remember, and there are many in this House who remember, when we were going along in this way on this particular kind of bill about four or five years ago, that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] rose and offered an amendment of $250,000 to help execute the Sherman antitrust law, that had been called for time and again by all the Attorneys-General, going way back almost to the beginning of that law, and in a few moments on the other side the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] offered an amendment, or a substitute, appropriating $500,000, and that became a law in that bill, and a few years after that we appropriated $250,000 to add to that $500,000, a part of which had been used, but a small part, I will say.

Each year since then we appropriated several hundred thousand more for that fund, and in the bill now pending we have $250,000 "balance," and add to that amount $100,000 or more, which would make that fund something over $400,000. Now, the fact is, Mr. Chairman, that for twelve months or more after that first $500,000 was appropriated there was less than $30,000 used by the Attorney-General and his associates in executing that law, and the most of that was used in the merger or "Northern Securities" case. There was a handful used in the beef-trust case, which dragged behind the merger case.

Now, gentlemen, what was the moral effect of appropriating that $500,000? It certainly did not have an immoral effect. It certainly showed the violators of that law that Congress meant to do all that it could to have the law executed.

And simply because violators of that law have grown in number; because trusts and combinations have become stronger in this country; because we have not been able to put a single one of the malefactors and violators of that law in the penitentiary; because we have not been able, in other words, to do as that law provides shall be done in a given case, does that argue that we shall abandon this appropriation, that we shall abandon the proposition and policy of keeping more than, you might say, just a sufficient amount in the hands of the Department of Justice of this country to enforce the law? Or does it not argue that we should keep it, in full amount, up to the standard with which we started, $500,000? And in the wisdom of the committee it is kept up in the neighborhood of $500,000, appropriating in this bill, as I say, $100,000, in addition to reappropriating the balance, $250,000, that is to the credit of the fund.

Mr. MANN. One hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. One hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. Now, gentlemen, what did the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] have to go by when he offered this $250,000 amendment? Nothing but his wisdom; nothing but his courage; nothing but his knowledge of law; nothing but his keen sense of right and justice toward the people. But he rose at his desk here and, like a thunderclap, proposed that amendment. And what did the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] have to go by when he proposed $500,000 in lieu? And what have we gone by when we have gone from $150,000 to $200,000 every year to keep that fund intact? We have had no facts; nothing but our general knowledge.

Now, here is our great railroad court—the Interstate Commerce Commission—that said at first they wanted $750,000. They made another investigation and, hurriedly, perhaps, said $500,000; and then the committee, in all its wisdom—and it is a great committee, a committee of strong men that I have great respect for—brought in, as I say, a little pittance of "$50,000."

I say "pittance" now because I think I said "pittance" at the time, because it looked like one compared to $750,000 and $500,000. I voted to raise the $50,000 to $350,000, and in the light of the conditions that then surrounded me I make no apologies now, no more than I did when I voted years ago for $500,000 to execute the Sherman antitrust law, or the subsequent sums we have added to that nucleus, with no official data to go by in fixing the sum.

What is the matter here? What great bugaboo are you making of the $350,000 that this Interstate Commerce Commission have not been dishonest enough to spend without just cause? They are an honest lot of men, or they would not be on that commission. Do you tell me that old man Cockrell would do something wrong, that great Jeffersonian Democrat from the State of Missouri? I say, "No."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the railroads were opposed to that amendment. Why? Because they thought that Roosevelt's dogs and the people's watchdog, that railroad commission, would soon be on their malevolent and lawless tracks. And now, because the commission has not been able to get the experts, because it has not been able to get the scientists, because in a few months it has not been able to do all the commission proposed to do under the law, and what they propose now to try to do and want to do, some Members here to-day make a great show of words and argument and demonstrate a great deal of spirit against the proposition, including the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], because his amendment for $350,000 was made law and he fought like a hero to have it made law.

As for me, I make no apologies for voting for it, and I shall vote against the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. And when I go into, if you please, the hills of private life in far-away "Sunny Tennessee," I shall stand then upon, as now, and have for years, every position I have taken here, to make the lawless railroad combinations and trusts turn loose the people's throats, their hands and feet, their liberties by nature and law, and let them stand up under the ægis of the American Constitution like freemen. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Because, Mr. Chairman, the commission has not been able to spend this money we are to vote it out. I hope the commission will find an opportunity to use it, if it is necessary in the execution of the law, which I am satisfied they will execute.

Suppose the Supreme Court decides against the railways on this commodity proposition. The commission will have to send a corps of men all over the country to investigate the question whether or not the railroads are owning their own coal mines and are operating them. After the commission has had a fair chance; after the railroads have stopped enjoining them; after the Supreme Court has been speaking in no uncertain tones, as it does every time it acts, the commission will proceed to set up the rights of the American people under the law. For my part, I am going to vote against the amendment of the gentleman from New York, and stand where I did a year ago. Let us stand firm and square with law and order, for justice to all, and err, if err we must, on the side of the people.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I take it that the gentleman from New York in offering his amendment only offers it as a part of that facetious cynicism which he sometimes gives to the House. There is not a Member in the House who has more facility in expressing in good-humored sarcasm a situation than the gentleman from New York. I take it that he only desires to emphasize the fact that a year ago, as events have now proven, the Committee on Appropriations was right and the President was wrong in reference to this appropriation. Now, if it had not been for the unfortunate language of the President in reference to the Committee on Appropriations there would be no discussion of this subject. When the Committee on Appropriations considered the matter a year ago they recommended an appropriation of $50,000 as being the amount that could be profitably expended during this fiscal year. The President in his ardor, and I do not criticise him for his ardor, but praise him for it—the President in his ardor sent a letter to the Speaker of the House in which he accused the Committee on Appropriations of proposing to indulge in "sham legislation." He stated that this was "sham opposition;" that the law had better be repealed than adopt the "sham proposition" of the Committee on Appropriations. It was unfortunate that the President was led to believe by some one in his confidence that the Interstate Commerce Commission could expend $350,000 in this work during this fiscal year. The commission, although they had first recommended over $700,000, although they had afterwards on consideration recommended $500,000, to their credit, when they had in their hands $350,000, proceeded in a logical and sensible manner, as the Committee on Appropriations had supposed when they reported the bill a year ago the commission would proceed.

It would seem that the Committee on Appropriations in reporting the bill a year ago had better knowledge of what the Interstate Commerce Commission could do in this fiscal year than the commission itself had. But the commission, although their pride might have led them to expend this money in order that they could say that it had been expended; although they might have expended it with a wish simply of justifying their opinion; yet the commission have not uselessly expended the money. They have waited until they could prepare a proper organization. That organization is in the course of further preparation and completion. The commission ought to have all the money it needs to enforce this uniform system of accounting. There was no disposition, I take it, on the part of the Committee on Appropriations a year ago to hamper the commission in the enforcement of that section. There certainly was no disposition on the part of the House or of Congress. Mr. Chairman, it often happens that executive branches of the Government think they can expend more money. It is the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to ascertain what they think can be expended; and while the Committee on Appropriations may desire to justify themselves, I do not believe that either the chairman of the committee or the members of that committee on the majority side or the members of that committee on the minority side, need to defend themselves on the floor of this House. That committee and its members have the confidence of the House, and I hope that after this proof of their correct prophesying they will have the confidence of the Chief Executive, who was wrong about the expenditures a year ago, and who ought to acknowledge now that the Committee on Appropriations knew more about the subject even than he did, although he accused them of "sham recommendations." [Loud applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say only a few words. Some Members of this House seem to imagine that unless those who disagree with members of the majority or with those in the executive department become offensive in their remarks that they can not be serious. I never take offense at the attitude of the Executive or of our friends on that side of the House. I can conceive that some wisdom is possessed by men in official life opposed both to the present occupant of the White House and to those who occupy seats on that side of the House.

Sometimes some officials become offended because I, in a very humble way, attempt to express the opinions I hold on public questions. It is a matter of indifference to me that they become offended. I try to maintain that equilibrium of temper which I believe is essential to the proper discharge of the duties of a Member of this House. Last year when this matter was before the House, I said this:

I say, so far as I am concerned, that I believe that with the $50,000 available for the next six months the commission will have an opportunity to demonstrate to its own satisfaction and to the satisfaction of reasonable men whether that amount is sufficient, or whether a much larger amount should be made available for this purpose.

Whenever I have an opportunity to demonstrate that in the discharge of my public duties my judgment has been accurate, I am glad to do so, even if it be that the good judgment of somebody else suffers by comparison. My judgment on this matter as formed last year has been vindicated. I am now of the opinion that the commission can not, during the coming fiscal year, use more than $125,000. Believing that, I have no hesitation in expressing that opinion and asking the judgment of the House upon that question. I know that it is not in harmony with the views of some other Members.

I am aware that some officials or some friends of some officials may imagine that I am engaged in an attempt to show that they were ignorant of questions upon which they should have possessed full knowledge, but even these fears can not deter me from doing that which I believe to be proper. If it were possible to separate this matter from the unfortunate surroundings in which it has been enveloped, I am quite convinced that a great majority of the House would unhesitatingly express the belief that my position is correct. But understanding the conditions, understanding the situation in which some gentlemen unfortunately find themselves, I suppose that this money, unnecessary now, will be voted to the commission, so as to make it appear that there is no possible difference of opinion or controversy between the Congress and the Executive. I am glad that gentlemen on that side of the House are now coming to realize the importance of having harmonious relations between the Executive and the legislative body.

From a political standpoint I can not help regretting that you are awakening to what is a wise thing, even at this late day. I hope that there will be many relapses from your present virtuous stand, because I know that it will result not only beneficially to the party of which I am a member, but that it will result in immense good to the great mass of the people of the country. Mr. Chairman, let me hope that those who do not fear not only the substance, but the shadow, of the "big stick," will have the courage to stand up and vote not to give money that is unnecessary at this time to this department of the Government.

Mr. MANN. Now, I suggest to the gentleman, as the "wind-up" of a very graceful speech, that he withdraw his amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. To be frank, I would do so if I did not have the absolute conviction that this money can not be used during the coming year. When the committee determined to make this appropriation, I said to the members of the committee that I did not believe the money could be used and that I would express my opinion in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has expressed his convictions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I wish to have this committee record once more the fact that it is unable to appreciate common sense and prefers to do what it knows to be improper rather than follow common sense when it has the opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate in regard to the use and necessity for block-signal systems and appliances for the automatic control of railway trains and any appliances or systems intended to promote the safety of railway operation which may be furnished in completed shape, including experimental tests, at the discretion of the commission, of such of said signal systems and appliances only as may be furnished in connection with such investigation, free of cost to the Government, $50,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "signal," in line 15, page 56.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 56, line 15, strike out "signal."

Mr. MANN. The word "signal" ought not to be in this provision, because it relates to appliances and systems for safety devices, regardless of whether they are signal systems and appliances or not. The original resolution only applied to signal appliances.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think the amendment ought to be adopted. There is no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice in lines 4, 5, 6, and 7, on page 56, this provision:

Hereafter all inspectors employed for the enforcement of said act shall also be required to make examination of the construction, adaptability, design, and condition of all mail cars used on any railroad in the United States and make report thereon, a copy of which report shall be transmitted to the Postmaster-General.

Does the expression "which report" mean that the inspectors shall make one report or does it mean "a copy of each report?"

Mr. TAWNEY. It is a report on the condition of the mail cars, a copy of which will be transmitted to the Postmaster-General. This provision has been carried in the sundry civil bill for two years. It was first suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; but it requires that "all inspectors" shall "make report," a copy of "which report," and so forth. Now, I want to know whether that one report——

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, no; they report individually to the commission.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I was simply calling attention to the language—to the words "which report."

Mr. OLMSTED. The gentleman's suggestion would be cured by changing the word "which" to "each," so that it would read "a copy of each report."

Mr. MANN. This is sent in as one report to the Postmaster-General?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know how it is sent to the Postmaster-General.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will state that this language was drawn at the office of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But is it accurate as it now reads? It says that they shall all sign one report—a copy of "which report," and so forth.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not think it so states. It says that all inspectors shall make examination and make report. It does not say that they shall make a report, but they are to report, and that may be a hundred reports, a copy of which report shall be transmitted to the Postmaster-General.

Now, to require that everybody shall make a report, and a copy of the report be sent, does not imply that there shall be a single report. I think the language is apt, and I want to say to the gentleman that it is a great economy to this Government in saving force of inspection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I was trying to get at the proper construction of the language.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I want to say that inasmuch as these inspectors are employees of the Interstate Commerce Commission, it is not proper for them to report to the Post-Office Department. They are to report to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and after they have reported, a copy of their report goes to the Post-Office Department for the purpose of advising it as to the safety of the cars for mail purposes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It does not say that they shall make a report to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but these inspectors are officers that have to report to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It says they shall "make report thereon"—I suppose that goes to the Interstate Commerce Commission—and that a copy of "which report"—"which report" is in the singular—"all inspectors" make one report.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not so regard it. I think the language is apt and, as I say, was prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday we passed two items, one on page 36 and the other on page 13. The one on page 13 was an amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], at the bottom of the page, inserting an item of $30,000 for the construction of a post-office at Everett, in the State of Washington. I ask to return to those two items.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from Minnesota will be granted.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 19, page 13, insert:

"Everett, Wash.: For site and completion of building under present limit, $30,000."

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that it is stated by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] that the site has been acquired for the construction of this building and that no site has been selected for the construction of a building at Walla Walla, although the fact was reported otherwise to the Committee on Appropriations.

I learned this morning from the Supervising Architect that while the site has been selected for Walla Walla there has been some change since that selection, and there is no site now on which to erect a public building in the city of Walla Walla. I am informed by the Supervising Architect that the amount asked for to construct the building at Everett could not be expended during the next fiscal year if Congress made the appropriation. I therefore hope that this amendment will be disagreed to, and then I shall move to strike out the provision for Walla Walla.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to read a copy of a letter which I hold in my hand, addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, dated February 20, 1909:

Referring to the act approved May 30, 1908, which authorized the purchase of a site and the erection of a building at Everett, Wash., at a cost of $135,000, I have the honor to state that the site has been acquired, and in order that the work on the building may be commenced in the near future, an appropriation of $40,000 is necessary. I have therefore earnestly to recommend that the following item be included in some appropriation bill of the present Congress:

"Everett, Wash., post-office and custom-house: For the prosecution of work under the present limit of cost, $40,000."

Mr. Chairman, that is addressed to the Speaker and signed by Mr. J. B. Reynolds, Acting Secretary of the Treasury. I am at a loss to understand why he should have written a letter of that kind, requesting an appropriation to be made at this Congress, if he has given out the information that it would not be needed. What is the necessity of writing a letter of that kind and earnestly urging that it be made, if that statement is correct?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say for the information of the gentleman from Washington that I did not say that the Acting Secretary of the Treasury made the statement to me that the money, if appropriated, could not be expended. It was the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department who made that statement to me, and it is upon his estimate and upon his testimony that the committee bases its recommendations. I want to further say that $35,000 is now available for the purchase of a site, and also to apply on the construction of a building in Everett, and that is all the Supervising Architect says that he can expend during the next fiscal year on this building, and that if we make the appropriation of the additional amount, he can not touch it or expend it during the next fiscal year. There is nothing to indicate that the site was selected before the date which the committee adopted as the date for the selection of sites, and for which we would carry appropriations, and to appropriate now this additional amount for Everett would be placing Everett in a class by itself. For that reason I do not think we ought to treat Everett different than other places, but that we should treat all of them alike.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I am not asking for different treatment from anyone else. I want to ask the gentleman whether that statement quoted was made in writing?

Mr. TAWNEY. In regard to what?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In regard to not desiring the appropriation for this year.

Mr. TAWNEY. The statement was made by the Supervising Architect this morning, in the presence of the subcommittee on the general deficiency appropriation bill. Whether the stenographer took it down or not, I do not know.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In view of the many statements that have been made both ways on this question, I would like to have some statement in writing in regard to the matter.

Mr. TAWNEY. I take it if the gentleman from Washington will apply to the Supervising Architect he will receive a statement in writing that if Congress should appropriate this money it would be impossible for him to expend it, for that is the statement he made to the subcommittee on the general deficiency bill this morning.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am going to ask that this item be again passed, to see if I can get a statement of that kind, so that we may have something in the RECORD to show the facts. I do not like to be placed in the position of having a statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury one way and nothing in the RECORD to show the other. I am not asking to be treated any differently in this matter from the rest; and if it is true, as he states, that the site was not selected before the 15th of January and it would be useless to appropriate the money this year, I do not want it. If the contrary is true, I do want it. In either case I want the record, so that the people who are interested in this building can know the truth.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I think that the estimate sent to the Speaker by the Acting Secretary of the Treasury was doubtless sent at the request of the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It was, I presume, and the statement made to the Speaker is that they want the appropriation now. The Acting Secretary says that he earnestly recommends that this item be included in some appropriation bill of the present Congress, asking for $40,000. The gentleman's information is to the contrary.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; my information is this: They now have $35,000. The site was not selected prior to the 15th of January.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that this may go over until to-morrow, to see if we can get a statement.

Mr. TAWNEY. I object.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Oh, do not object; let us get what the facts are.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. TAWNEY. I object for this reason: I think the matter ought to be disposed of on the statement of the gentleman himself. He does not bring himself within the rule, stating that the site has been selected some time in the month of February.

We have rejected appropriations in every case except one, which was spoken of yesterday, where the site was selected subsequent to the time the revised estimates came in, and I simply added the further reason why we should not make the appropriations, which was that the Supervising Architect said that if the money was appropriated it could not be expended, as they had $35,000 now.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman will wait until to-morrow and I get the statement from the architect, and it is as the gentleman has stated, why then I will agree it may be stricken out without further argument or debate. What I want is to get a statement from the department in such shape that I can put it in the RECORD and show what the facts really are in reference to this matter.

Mr. TAWNEY. With that understanding, Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not intend to take up any more time, but I do not think the gentleman would gain any time by not doing so.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask to return to page 36, lines 3 to 5, inclusive, Walla Walla, and I move to strike them out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 36, strike out lines 3, 4, and 5.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WATSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 28245, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take the fortifications appropriation bill (H. R. 27054) from the Speaker's table, nonconcur in the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take the fortifications appropriation bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Are there many amendments to this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. One.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why not concur in it; it is so modest?

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the Chair announces the following conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SMITH of Iowa, Mr. GRAFF, and Mr. SHERLEY.

CITY AND SUBURBAN RAILWAY.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 20837 and ask to nonconcur in the Senate amendments and send the same to conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks to take from the Speaker's table the following bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20837) to authorize certain extensions of the City and Suburban Railway of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this should go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Upon what ground?

Mr. MANN. There are a number of Senate amendments which would require consideration in the Committee of the Whole House, as I recall them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a moment? I concede the gentleman has the right, but I want to say that if that bill has to go back to the committee it means that two bills of some importance will not be considered at this session of Congress. Now, this amendment was put on the city and suburban bill, and it passed the other day, which is simply in the interest of safety to life——

Mr. MANN. A very simple bill passed the House the other day——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It was.

Mr. MANN (continuing). And a very complicated and complex bill comes back from the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The second amendment simply authorizes the Washington, Spa Springs and Gretta Railroad Company——

Mr. MANN. Oh, the Senate amendment authorizes every other car line in the city of Washington to do certain things that they are not now authorized to do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is the first amendment.

Mr. MANN. Well, I think it ought to be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union before it is enacted into law. It is a very sweeping and broad proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, I was in hopes the gentleman would withdraw his objection and let it go to conference. I think the matter can be satisfactorily adjusted there to the satisfaction of the two Houses.

Mr. MANN. It is a proposition that I think ought to be considered by the Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman, as a matter of fact, whether or not the Bladensburg road is held in fee by the United States in whole or in part?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The bill is properly on the Union Calendar. There is no question about that. It is a Senate bill which the House has already considered. It is properly on the Union Calendar, and that is why I ask unanimous consent, as I did, to send it to conference.

The SPEAKER. Does the original House bill give such location on the Bladensburg road as the Senate bill? The Senate amendment, touching the right of way on the Bladensburg road, is new?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 15230, an act to amend an act approved February 28, 1901, entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. That ought to go to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will reserve his objection for just a moment.

Mr. MADDEN. I make the point of order that it ought to be on the Union Calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This only strikes out——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is not well taken. It merely amends the bill by striking out the words "sickness or."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is one of the two ways in which they were to get relief.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think it is not subject to a point of order. But under the rule it is subject to such motion——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in order to take up and dispose of District of Columbia business the same as of yesterday, after the disposition of the sundry civil bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

INDIANS OF FORT BERTHOLD RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request from the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate a bill (S. 8918) to provide for the payment to certain Indians of Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, in North Dakota, for certain horses condemned and destroyed by the Bureau of Animal Industry in the years 1906 and 1907.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the request of the Senate will be complied with.

There was no objection.

SUBPORT OF ENTRY, RANIER, MINN.

Mr. BEDE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 9017, and amend by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the bill H. R. 27478, which is No. 421 on the Union Calendar. This is a bill for a subport of entry at Ranier, Minn.

The Senate bill contains the words "St. Paul," where it should contain the word "Minnesota." It should be "collection district of Minnesota," but in the Senate bill it says "collection district of St. Paul."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BEDE] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 9017) for the establishment of a subport of entry at Ranier, Minn., and amend by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the bill H. R. 27478.

The Chair would suggest to the gentleman to strike out the words "St. Paul."

Mr. BEDE. The House bill has been reported by the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. Precisely. How does the House bill differ from the Senate bill?

Mr. BEDE. It is the same, except the name. I would be willing to correct it by striking out "St. Paul."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the words "St. Paul" be stricken out of the Senate bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Subsequently,

The SPEAKER. Without objection, House bill 27478, substantially similar to the bill of the Senate which has just been amended, will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

LANDS IN THE CANAL ZONE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 18694) relating to the use, control, and ownership of lands in the Canal Zone, Isthmus of Panama, with Senate amendments, which were read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move the House concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What are the amendments of the Senate?

Mr. MANN. The House bill originally passed last year was for the leasing of lands on the Canal Zone. Section 4 authorized the President to make exchange of lands. The necessity for that has expired, I may say, and the Senate amendment has stricken that out and renumbered the sections.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to concur in the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill (H. R. 27523) has been returned from the Senate and is on the Speaker's table. I ask unanimous consent that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and send the bill to conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference thereon. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair appoints the following conferees: Mr. COUSINS, Mr. LANDIS, and Mr. HOWARD.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To make a motion, may it please the Chair. I would like to see if we can get some time for the disposition of District business.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's motion?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I move that it may be in order to take up and dispose of District bills, the same as it was in order on Monday, after the disposition of the sundry civil bill. I desire to state that there are certain Members——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion is hardly in order. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I move that it may be in order after the disposition of the sundry civil appropriation bill to take up and dispose of District business the same as of yesterday.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that it is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order; it is not in order under the rule. If the gentleman desires to ask unanimous consent——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I made the request, and that was refused. There was objection made. I asked unanimous consent, and some one objected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to unanimous consent being granted for the purpose of considering unobjected bills, but that is the only condition upon which I am willing to give unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There are 15 or 20 bills on the calendar, and somebody could get up and raise an objection to every bill. There is the bill for admission to the insane asylum, the teachers' retirement bill, and three or four others that would take considerable time that we could not get up if there was objection. We have several Senate bills that we would like to dispose of.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my objection on the condition that bills be called up for unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, I will accept that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman modifies the request, and asks unanimous consent that, on the completion of the sundry civil bill, it shall be in order to call up bills by unanimous consent relating to the District of Columbia.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to know for what length of time. You say, after finishing this bill, the same day or next day.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I did not hear the request of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. KEIFER. There ought to be some limit of time in which they can call up the bills.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman make his request that it be in order, after the disposition of the sundry civil bill, to take up bills reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to the consideration of which no objection is made. That limits the time, in effect.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman modify his request?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I did not hear the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that, on the completion of the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, it shall be in order to call up bills in order on Monday, District day, to which bills no objection is made.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not object to that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does that give him any right that he does not now possess?

The SPEAKER. It would make it in order for the gentleman to ask unanimous consent. As it is now, it would be in order to ask unanimous consent, if the gentleman could humiliate himself enough to suggest to the Speaker that he submit the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. I take it that the regular order at that time would be the presentation of such bills, with the right to object to their consideration, which makes quite a difference.

Mr. SHERLEY. Do I understand that this takes away from the Speaker the very important power of determining whether he will grant recognition?

The SPEAKER. Greatly to the Speaker's gratification, yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Out of consideration for the Speaker, I shall not object. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills and resolutions of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 8245. An act to authorize appeals to be taken from the judgments of the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States in certain cases now pending before the Court of Claims, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 8058. An act authorizing the Attorney-General to appoint as special police officers such employees of the Alaska school service as may be named by the Secretary of the Interior—to the Committee on the Territories.

S. 7298. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901—to the Committee on the Library.

S. 7226. An act granting certain land in the city of Alva, Okla., used for land-office purposes by the Government, to the city of Alva, Okla.—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 4229. An act for the relief of Capt. John C. Wilson, U. S. Navy, retired—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

S. 4027. An act to parole United States prisoners, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 8518. An act empowering the juvenile court of the District of Columbia to issue execution on forfeited recognizances—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 8905. An act for the establishment of a probation system for the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Senate concurrent resolution 102.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 15,000 additional copies of Senate document 547, Sixtieth Congress, second session, relating to customs tariffs and consisting of Senate and House Reports of 1888, 1890, 1894, and 1897, 5,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 10,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives—to the Committee on Printing.

Senate concurrent resolution 103.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound in cloth 1,500 additional copies of the final report of Jamestown Tercentennial Commission, embodying the reports of the various officers of the Jamestown Exposition held at Norfolk, Va., in 1907, with accompanying illustrations; 500 copies for the use of the Senate and 1,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives—to the Committee on Printing.

HOUSE BILL WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, House bill (with Senate amendments) of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

H. R. 20837. An act entitled "An act to authorize certain extensions of the City and Suburban Railway of Washington, and for other purposes"—to the Commitee on the District of Columbia.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 27139. An act to provide for the sittings of the United States circuit and district courts of the northern district of Ohio at the city of Youngstown, in said district; and

H. R. 26068. An act providing for an additional judge for the western district of Pennsylvania, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 5989. An act authorizing the Department of State to deliver to Maj. C. De W. Willcox decoration and diploma presented by Government of France; and

S. 7829. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Keithsburg, in the State of Illinois, and to establish it as a post-road," approved April 26, 1882.

RECESS.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.), the House took a recess until Wednesday, February, 24, 1909, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Trent River, North Carolina (H. Doc. No. 1471)—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Thomas R. Hardaway, administrator of estate of Alfred Anderson, against The United States (H. Doc. No. 1472)—to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriation for site for a public building at Morgantown, W. Va. (H. Doc. No. 1473)—to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriation for work on the public building at Everett, Wash. (H. Doc. No. 1474)—to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the joint resolution of the House (H. J. Res. 225.) authorizing the selection of a site and the erection of a pedestal for the Alexander Hamilton memorial in Washington, D. C., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2224), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. McCALL, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 17986) providing for the erection of two memorial arches at Valley Forge, Pa., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2225), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GILLETT, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 28286) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 2227), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HULL of Iowa, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 28304) granting certain obsolete ordnance for ornamental purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2229), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. S. 4852. Elizabeth Smith Tennent; and
S. 6231. Lilla May Pavy.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pension the following persons at the rate per month stated:

Elizabeth W. Waters, widow of Abner W. Waters, late captain Company F, First Regiment Oregon Volunteer Infantry, $12.

Henry Horn, late of Company H, Ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, $24.

Franklin L. Hayes, late of Company F, One hundred and fifty-seventh Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, $36.

John Deitrick, late first lieutenant Company K, Eighty-third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Robert L. Rohm, late of Company F, Nineteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry, $24.

Charles J. Stevens, late of Company H, Second Regiment Michigan Volunteer Cavalry, $24.

Hermund Gudmandson, late of Company A, Twenty-third Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Joseph R. Landes, late of Company B, Sixth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, $24.

John Newhouse, late of Company K, Eleventh Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, $24.

William Fifer, late of Company H, One hundredth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, $24.

Timothy Donovan, late of Company G, Twenty-first Regiment, Company K, Thirty-sixth Regiment, and Company C, Fifty-sixth Regiment, Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Homer J. Budd, late musician, band, Forty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, $24.

James Metzger, late captain Company C, Fifty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, $40.

Elizabeth Smith Tennent, dependent sister of Edward Smith Tennent, late of Company A, First Regiment Louisiana Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain, $8.

Lilla May Pavy, widow of Octave P. Pavy, late acting assistant surgeon, United States Army, $30.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 26394) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 6, 8, 44, and 45.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 4, 5, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 38, 40, 41, 42, 43, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 52, 53, 54, 56, and 57, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the last line of the amendment strike out the word "pending," and after the word "controversy," in the same line, insert the words "now pending;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of the amendment strike out the word "stores" and insert in lieu thereof the word "storehouse;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out insert the following: "And provided further, That hereafter it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to report to Congress at the beginning of each regular session thereof, in addition to the report directed to be made in the act of March 2, 1907, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for other purposes, a detailed statement showing the amount expended from each of the appropriations for the repair of every ship where such repairs exceed for any one ship the sum of two hundred thousand dollars in any one fiscal year;" and the Senate agree to the same.

On the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 7, 11, 18, 39, 55, 58, and 59: The committee of conference have been unable to agree.

EUGENE HALE,
GEORGE C. PERKINS,
B. R. TILLMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
L. P. PADGETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate further insist on its amendments not agreed to in the report and ask for a further conference with the House, the conferees to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice-President appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. TILLMAN the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

ANNIVERSARY OF DISCOVERY OF LAKE CHAMPLAIN.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 257) to authorize the Secretary of State to invite the Governments of France and Great Britain to participate in the proposed tercentenary celebration of the discovery of Lake Champlain by Samuel de Champlain. I call the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] to the joint resolution.

Mr. DEPEW. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

PENSIONS OF ARMY NURSES.

Mr. SCOTT. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 185) increasing the pensions of nurses in certain cases, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 1081) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to ask the Senator from West Virginia if this is not granting to nurses a larger rate of pension than is granted to the widows of soldiers who served in the civil war. In other words, the wives of the soldiers, who themselves were subjected to great annoyance and to great suffering while their husbands were in the field, I think, are granted a lower rate of pension than is proposed in this bill to the nurses. Am I right, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. SCOTT. I think the Senator is mistaken. It is a graded pension.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that it simply grants a flat rate of $12 to nurses. That is my recollection.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the bill proposes to grant a pension according to age.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is not what I understood.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the bill be read again. Evidently it is not understood.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let it go over, and it can be amended.

Mr. SCOTT. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

ALASKA SHORT LINE RAILROAD.

Mr. PILES. By direction of the Committee on Territories, I report back favorably, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. 23717) to extend the time for construction and beginning construction of the Alaska Short Line Railroad in Alaska, and I submit a report (No. 1072) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment was, to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That said company shall file with the Secretary of the Interior maps of definite location of its line of road, prior to the beginning of the construction of any 20-mile section thereof, the same to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, as is now required by the act approved May 14, 1898, providing for right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska.

Mr. KEAN. Let me ask the Senator from Washington within what time the parties are required to file the maps?

Mr. PILES. There is no time stated, but before they can proceed with a section they must file a map of definite location.

Mr. KEAN. There ought to be some definite time in which to file the maps, I think.

Mr. PILES. The time is extended by the bill, and within the period prescribed they must file the maps.

Mr. KEAN. What is the date to which the time is extended?

Mr. PILES. It is extended to a period of five years from the 1st day of June, 1910.

Mr. KEAN. That is an extension of six or seven years.

Mr. PILES. It is all right.

Mr. KEAN. It is wrong. I move to strike out "five years" and make the time three years.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is first on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey moves an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 7, before the word "years," strike out "five" and insert "three," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in consideration of the construction of the Alaska Short Line Railroad in Alaska being actually commenced prior to June 1, 1910, the time for the completion of the survey and construction of said railroad be, and the same is hereby, extended to a period of three years from said 1st day of June, A. D. 1910.

Mr. PILES. I do not wish the Senate to do that, but if the Senator insists on it and the Senate agrees with him, of course I can not help it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

REPORT OF ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSION.

Mr. ELKINS. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred S. Res. 292, submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] on the 19th instant, to report a substitute in the nature of a concurrent resolution. I ask for its present consideration.

The concurrent resolution (S. C. Res. 105) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,000 additional copies of the Annual Report of the Isthmian Canal Commission for 1908, with accompanying illustrations; 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ELKINS. I move that Senate resolution 292, providing for the printing of 3,000 additional copies of the Annual Report of the Isthmian Canal Commission, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ELKINS introduced a bill (S. 9455) to amend section 4434 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. du PONT introduced a bill (S. 9456) increasing the pay of the secretary to the Admiral of the Navy, which was read twice by its title and, with an accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. McCREARY introduced a bill (S. 9457) for the relief of Mrs. A. C. Lester and others, which was read twice by its title and, with an accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CLAY introduced a bill (S. 9458) for the relief of Wellborn Echols, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SUTHERLAND introduced a bill (S. 9459) granting a pension to Samuel Garn, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TALIAFERRO introduced a bill (S. 9460) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated, misbranded, or falsely graded naval stores, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I ask that the bill lie on the table, and I wish to give notice that on Friday morning, February 26, immediately after the routine morning business, I shall ask that the bill be taken up, in order that I may submit some remarks upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HALE. I did not hear what the Senator from Florida said. I understood that he was making a proposition to take up some measure on Friday. I wish to say to Senators that in any provision or agreement for the taking up of distinct bills there ought to be an exception, not to interfere with appropriation bills.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I have given notice that I would ask that this bill be taken up merely to submit some remarks upon it. When I conclude the bill will go to committee.

Mr. HALE. The Senator does not propose any action?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. None whatever.

Mr. HALE. To that I should have to object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie on the table.

Mr. BURKETT introduced a bill (S. 9461) granting an increase of pension to John Hastings, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TILLMAN introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 9462) for the relief of heirs or estate of Sarah Quick, deceased; and

A bill (S. 9463) for the relief of James M. Beattie.

Mr. CRANE introduced a bill (S. 9464) granting an increase of pension to Charles J. Rhoades, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BAILEY (by request) introduced a bill (S. 9465) for the relief of the heirs or devisees of Giulio Posi and Eleanor B. Posi, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to certain parties named, or their legal representatives, certain amounts found to be held in excess of the commissions to which the taxpayers were entitled to as owners of private dies, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURROWS submitted an amendment providing for the dredging of the Au Sable River, Michigan, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC-BUILDING ACTS.

Mr. DOLLIVER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 28167) to grant additional authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out certain provisions of public-building acts, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 28167) to grant additional authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out certain provisions of public-building acts, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

LATIN AMERICA AND THE WEST INDIES.

Mr. LODGE. I present a brief statement prepared by Horace N. Fisher, of Brookline, Mass., a distinguished writer and statistician of my State, relative to the ethnography and commercial importance of Latin America and the West Indies in 1906. It is a very brief paper and a very valuable one. I move that the statement, together with the map, be printed as a document (S. Doc. No. 737).

The motion was agreed to.

MORRILL LAND-GRANT ACTS.

Mr. BURNHAM. I present a brief by Richard D. Harlan, on behalf of the George Washington University, Washington, D. C., relative to an amendment to the Morrill Act of 1862, and acts supplemental thereto, donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, so as to admit the District of Columbia to the benefits thereof. I move that it be printed as a document (S. Doc. No. 736).

The motion was agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 27523) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. CLAY the conferees on the part of the Senate.

TIMBER ON INDIAN LAND.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4548) to provide for the sale of timber on allotted Indian land, and for other purposes.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendment of the House of Representatives, and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. CLAPP, Mr. BROWN, and Mr. BANKHEAD conferees on the part of the Senate.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 27054) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. PERKINS, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. TILLMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

FORT BERTHOLD INDIAN RESERVATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (S. 8918) to provide for the payment to certain Indians of Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, in North Dakota, for certain horses condemned and destroyed by the Bureau of Animal Industry in the years 1906 and 1907, returned from the House of Representatives in compliance with the request of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

SUBPORT OF ENTRY AT RANIER, MINN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 9017) for the establishment of a subport of entry at Ranier, Minn., which was, in lines 4 and 5, to strike out "St. Paul."

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE GRANGER.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I give notice that on Saturday, February 27, I shall ask the Senate to consider resolutions commemorative of the life and character of Hon. DANIEL L. D. GRANGER, late a Representative from the State of Rhode Island.

MONTANA, WYOMING AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the House be requested to return the bill (H. R. 24149) granting to the Montana, Wyoming and Southern Railway Company a right of way across the Fort Keogh Military Reservation, Mont.

The motion was agreed to.

THE PARLIAMENT OF TURKEY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States (S. Doc. No. 738), which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State communicating the reply of the Ottoman Chamber of Deputies to the congratulation and good wishes extended to the Parliament of Turkey by the Senate in its resolution of December 17, 1908.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 24, 1909.

ALLEN H. HAMITER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, on motion of Mr. FULTON, was, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Claims:

To the Senate:

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring) of February 22 I return herewith Senate bill numbered 4024 entitled "An act for the relief of Allen H. Hamiter, administrator of the estate of John H. Hamiter."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 24, 1909.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 27363. An act to provide for improving the navigable capacity of the Sabine and Neches rivers and the canal connecting the Sabine and Neches rivers with the mouth of Taylors Bayou was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

H. R. 27473. An act to amend an act approved January 5, 1905, entitled "An act to incorporate the American National Red Cross," was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PENROSE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 26305) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 14, 17, 18, 20, 21, 23, 25, and 27.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 13, 15, 16, 19, 22, 24, 26, 28, and 29.

And agree to the same.

BOIES PENROSE,
J. P. DOLLIVER,
A. S. CLAY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JESSE OVERSTREET,
JOHN J. GARDNER,
JOHN A. MOON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill 27053, the agricultural appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 27053) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out lines 8, 9, and 10, on page 16, in the following words:

For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain, and the fixing of definite grades thereof, $52,440.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas will not prevail. It is to carry out existing law and to continue work already under way. It has no reference to the amendment which was stricken out on a point of order. I therefore hope the amendment may not carry.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I do not understand that a provision in an appropriation bill which lasts only for a year is existing law. I do not understand that the fixing of the standard of grain has been adopted by Congress in a form that makes it a continuing appropriation.

I would suggest to the Senator from Texas that his purpose would be accomplished by striking out the words "and the fixing of definite grades thereof," leaving the question of investigation to be continued, with some reasonable provision for paying the expenses of such an investigation.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps the Senator from Rhode Island has not read the part of the law which precedes this.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have read a part of an appropriation bill made for a fiscal year ending at a certain time, and which expires by limitation whenever that fiscal year expires.

Mr. WARREN. That is correct.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is not in existing law except that it is a portion of an appropriation bill for one year. It is a law for one year. It is not a continuing law.

Mr. WARREN. As the Senator from Rhode Island has stated, the appropriation made last year was, as he says, for the fiscal year. This sum is to continue the work that was started there and in the laboratories already built. Therefore, we are carrying out the intent of existing law because we are yet under the law, the fiscal year not having expired. It is a provision in the bill to cover and provide for what was inserted heretofore. That is the point I make.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not object to the continuation of the investigation, and I do not think the Senator from Texas does.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I do object to the continuance of the investigation, because I know that that will result at last just as it has resulted now, in a provision attempting to establish some law as the result of the investigation. That is the way all these departures are made. First they come for an investigation. They ask for an appropriation merely to gather statistics or information, and then, after they get the statistics and information, the next appropriation practically incorporates what they have found out to be done into a law as a conclusion of Congress.

Still, I would rather that half a wrong should be done than a whole wrong; and if the Senator from Wyoming will agree to let the provision for grading go out—I do not need to ask him, but I will abide by the judgment of the Senate—I will agree to that kind of a compromise, though I protest even against that.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask the Senator from Texas if his remarks are with relation to cotton or to grain? This particular matter which he proposes to strike out is purely for the handling of grain and has no reference to cotton.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand. Of course the objection applies to both, but as we have the grain amendment under consideration, we could only agree about that. At the proper time I am going to move to strike out that objectionable phraseology with respect to cotton.

Mr. WARREN. How would an amendment of this kind meet the view of the Senator from Texas? I will read it. In place of the language in lines 8, 9, and 10, insert:

For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain, and for the study of the factors entering into the usual operations connected therewith, $52,440.

Mr. BAILEY. Just exactly what the Federal Government has to do with the study of factors that enter into these things is beyond my comprehension. Yet I presume it has the same power in that respect that it has in respect to the handling of grain.

Mr. WARREN. The whole bill is based upon the result of investigations. There is nothing in the bill and nothing in the Agricultural Department but what refers to investigation in the numerous and various subjects, including, among others, the condition of grain as to moisture and many other factors.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it has become a habit when any persons want to do anything that they know the Constitution will not permit them to do they do it in a circuitous way. They exercise a power which belongs to Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution or under the taxation clause. In other words, they use some admitted power to base some usurped power upon.

If Congress has any power with respect to the handling or shipping and other facts relating to the grain trade, it can only be with respect to it as related to interstate commerce, and absolutely it has no power to even study the question as it is affected by intrastate or as it affects intrastate commerce. But I would object to that. I object to the original provision.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Wyoming to the progress which we have made in this direction, and the conversation that is now occurring between the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] reminds me of it.

Years ago, under the constitutional command, we began to take the census; that is, to enumerate the people, for the constitutional and necessary purpose of apportioning Representatives. But men were not satisfied with obeying the constitutional command to enumerate the persons in order that we might apportion Representatives, and gradually they began to count the cattle and to measure the land, and then they began to inquire into the domestic relations, into the habits and into the infirmities of the people, and the present census bill carries a provision that will put a man in jail if he refuses to answer questions respecting his private affairs.

The Congress of the United States, in my opinion, has not the shadow of a power to send a man to jail because he will not tell the census enumerator how much land he cultivates, how much he rents, and how much he owns. It may have power to send him to jail if he refuses to tell the number of his family, because we have not only the power, but we are under the duty of enumerating the people.

But they have not stopped there. They have gone on, as they do in every respect, increasing the Federal Government's power, encroaching upon the State and the individual and the county and the town, until for the first time we have had incorporated in our census bill a provision to send a man to jail unless he answers the questions. I vainly endeavored to have that stricken out.

Of course, I believe that no man can be sent to jail under that provision, and it comes here with a recommendation of the department. They can not enumerate the people unless they have the power to put a man in jail if he refuses to tell about the number of acres of land which he cultivates.

Thus, Mr. President, we go on from bad to worse, until I myself can not foresee the end.

I am going to be beaten about it, anyway, I am satisfied, and I believe it is just as well to be beaten from top to bottom as to compromise. I think I will object to the amendment which the Senator from Wyoming offers, because it is only a still further investigation for the purpose of laying the predicate for a still further exercise of power.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. I should be very much obliged to the Senator from Wyoming if he would read the suggested amendment.

Mr. WARREN. The amendment is at the Secretary's desk.

Mr. RAYNER. Let the Secretary read it.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say before the amendment is read that the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is to strike out the House language; and if that be agreed to, we shall then meet a condition where it will either be the language as it now is or nothing, where an acceptance of the matter——

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no. The conferees, in case of language being stricken out, report it back with an amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Not at all. When a matter goes out entirely——

Mr. BAILEY. But it is not out as to the Senate. The matter in controversy between the House and the Senate is no language or that language, and anything between no language and that language is permissible.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is right about that; but, as I say, to accept this would probably settle it, whereas with the other proposition it is more likely to remain as it is.

Mr. RAYNER. Could we not hear the proposition? I did not hear it.

Mr. WARREN. I repeat that the Secretary has the proposed amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 9, after the word "grain," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the paragraph and to insert "and for study of the factors entering into the usual operations connected therewith, $52,440," so that if amended the paragraph will read:

> For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain, and for study of the factors entering into the usual operations connected therewith, $52,440.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. RAYNER. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know that I care to interrupt the Senator from Maryland. I was only about to say that so far as I am personally concerned I have no objection to the amendment now offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], but I do object strenuously to any attempt to give the Secretary of Agriculture the right to fix the grade of grain.

Mr. RAYNER. There is so much noise we can not hear the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. I say I have no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming, and I am willing to accept it.

Mr. RAYNER. Has the Senator from Rhode Island fully understood the amendment, that it is not in the alternative but it is in the conjunctive; and that it gives the Department of Agriculture not only the right to investigate the handling and grading and transportation of grain, but the fixing of definite grades thereof; and gives him the further right to investigate it for the purpose of settling the question?

Mr. ALDRICH. But the Senator from Wyoming strikes out the language for fixing the grade.

Mr. RAYNER. He gives the right to investigate the handling, grading, and transportation of grain, and then he gives them a further power.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is a question of method.

Mr. RAYNER. I doubt that very much.

Mr. President, I want to say a few words about that. Of course, if the Senator from Rhode Island accepts it, I suppose the Senate will accept it; but before that acceptance——

Mr. WARREN. I wish to make this matter plain, and I will withdraw that suggested amendment. I ask that it be returned to me.

Mr. RAYNER. The suggestion is a better suggestion than the one that is in the bill itself as it came from the House of Representatives. I am not criticising it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming withdraws his proposed amendment.

Mr. RAYNER. Will the Senator kindly allow me to look at that a moment? If we are to have anything, this is better than what is in the bill.

Mr. WARREN. I am willing that a vote should be had upon the original matter.

Mr. RAYNER. The trouble about this matter, I think, is this——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Wyoming would like to pass this bill. Before this bill will be passed, the Senator from Wyoming will have a long debate upon the provision in the bill that asserts the power of the Federal Government to establish grades for wheat.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Or cotton.

Mr. BAILEY. Or cotton, either.

Mr. WARREN. In the interest of getting along with this bill, I withdrew my amendment. I am ready, however, to have a vote upon the question. I am endeavoring to meet the views of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Wyoming is endeavoring to overcome my views, for he is very confident that he is going to vote down my amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Not at all; I have no such assurance.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I should like to know what the agreement is to be. I suppose I have a right to discuss this proposition, and I shall discuss it very briefly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is open to discussion.

Mr. RAYNER. It will only take me a few moments to say what I intend to say about it.

Yesterday I referred to the case of the United States v. Boyer. I thought perhaps I might have made a mistake about it, because I did not then have the case before me; but in sending for the case this morning I found that I was right in my recollection of it, and that it sustained the principles I announced in the Senate.

This clause might be in the old law; but my trouble about it is not that. The language here is different from the language that is in the old agricultural appropriation act; it is more concise; but in being more concise, I am afraid that it gives much greater powers. Now, let us look at it for a moment. The motion is to strike out the clause—

> For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain and the fixing of definite grades thereof.

My trouble about that is that the House of Representatives has put it so concisely that the Secretary of Agriculture, under that provision, will have a right to send inspectors into the States for the purpose of fixing the grades of grain that the proposition refers to. I think the Secretary of Agriculture will exercise that power. I think, when you give him the power to investigate the handling, that, in order to investigate the handling, he has the right to handle, for you can not investigate the handling of grain without handling the grain, and that would, either by implication or by express grant, carry with it the power to send an inspector into a State, not only for the purpose of handling the grain that is intended for transportation—which the inspector would not have any right to do until it leaves the State—but for handling all the grain that is intended to be sold in the State.

Let me give the Senate this case and see how far it goes. I ask the attention of the Senate to it. This is the case of the United States v. Boyer, which was decided by a district judge. There was no appeal taken to the circuit court of appeals or to the Supreme Court, because the Government had no right at that time to take an appeal, but upon a careful examination of authorities, I find that there has been no reversal of that decision.

The acts of Congress found in First Supplement, Revised Statutes, page 937, and Second Supplement, Revised Statutes, page 403, whereby the Secretary of Agriculture was empowered to have made a careful inspection of cattle, sheep, and hogs at slaughterhouses located in the several States, which were about to be slaughtered, the products of which were intended for sale in other States or foreign countries, were enacted without any constitutional warrant, and are therefore void.

I should like to ask the attention of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to this case. I think it relevant to the discussion that is proceeding now.

The rules and regulations made by the Secretary of Agriculture in pursuance to such statutes, whereby inspectors are appointed and placed in packing houses within the States to inspect cattle, sheep, and hogs which were about to be slaughtered, or their carcasses when slaughtered, and the products of which were intended for sale in other States or foreign countries, having been made in pursuance of the acts of Congress referred to, supra, were likewise made without any constitutional warrant, and are therefore void.

I only intend to quote the conclusion at which the court arrives. In rendering the decision the court said:

From these authorities it follows that—

"When the [interstate] commerce begins is determined, not by the character of the commodity, nor by the intention of the owner to transfer it to another State for sale, nor by his preparation of it for transportation, but by its actual delivery to a common carrier for transportation, or the actual commencement of its transfer to another State. At that time the power and regulating authority of the State ceases and that of Congress attaches and continues until it has reached another State and become mingled with the general mass of the property in the latter State. That neither the production or manufacture of articles or commodities which constitute subjects of commerce, and which are intended for trade and traffic with citizens of other States, nor the preparation for their transportation from the State where produced or manufactured prior to the commencement of the actual transfer or transmission thereof to another State, constitutes that interstate commerce which comes within the regulating power of Congress." (In re Greene, 52 Fed., 113.)

The Jacob Dold Packing Company—

That is the company they inspected here—

The Jacob Dold Packing Company, therefore, while engaged in slaughtering and packing cattle, sheep, and hogs within the State of Missouri, the carcasses and products of which they intended to transport and sell for human consumption in other States and Territories, or in foreign countries, were not engaged in interstate commerce; and, not being engaged in interstate commerce, their business was in no sense subject to be regulated by Congress under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. The cases which I have quoted sufficiently indicate that the regulations which the Secretary of Agriculture under the act of Congress sought to exercise, and which are alleged in the indictment, are clearly and exclusively lodged in the State of Missouri and not in the Government of the United States.

I want the Senator from North Dakota to understand that I do not here draw any distinction between intrastate and interstate commerce. This provision is perhaps not subject to the criticism that it would apply to commerce within the State.

Mr. ALDRICH. What is the date of that decision?

Mr. RAYNER. The date of that decision is February 28, 1898, and it was rendered by Judge Rogers in the district court for the western district of Missouri in the case of The United States v. Boyer, Eighty-fifth Federal Reporter, 425.

Mr. BAILEY. What did the Senator say was the date of the decision?

Mr. RAYNER. It was rendered in 1898. I want to explain that, for under the present law there is the same provision. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], in a number of addresses he has made here, has always contended that we had the right, under the clause to regulate commerce, to send inspectors into the States, and I have always assumed that the Congress had passed upon it. I wrote to the Attorney-General and asked him whether there had ever been a reversal of the decision in this case, which never went to the Supreme Court of the United States.

I also asked him whether this was so under that law. He said yes; that the same provision which had been pronounced to be unconstitutional was in the present law, and that if this decision should be sustained the law would be pronounced unconstitutional. I want the Senator from North Dakota to understand that I am not criticising it because it does not draw the distinction between intrastate and interstate commerce. It does not draw that distinction. That is not the object of my criticism. I criticise it upon a broader ground. I say that, under the power to investigate the handling and the fixing of definite grades, the Secretary of Agriculture could assume, and perhaps would assume if the emergency of the case required it, the right to send inspectors into a State for the purpose of inspecting grain in order that he could properly investigate its handling and properly fix its definite grade.

I say, therefore, that whether it is in the old law or not it is legislation that ought not to be in an appropriation bill, because if you are going to appropriate money you ought to define the purposes for which the money is appropriated. I do not propose to discuss that question to-day, because it is too broad a question to discuss in an argument upon an appropriation bill, but you ought to define the purposes upon the face of the legislation, and unless those purposes cover some of the enumerated powers of the Constitution I hold that you have no right to make the appropriation.

I do not believe in the doctrine that you can make an appropriation for the general welfare of the people, and I do not believe that you can make an appropriation to be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of fixing definite grades of grain, because I think that carries with it a power that has already been pronounced unconstitutional by the courts, and that is the power to send into the States inspectors for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act, both in reference to intrastate commerce and in reference to interstate commerce. I am very much afraid of this provision.

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. So that the matter may come up in the way it is intended—this is an unperfected provision—I move to insert, after the word "the," in line 8, the words "methods of," so that it will read:

For investigating the methods of handling, grading, and transportation of grain, etc.

Mr. RAYNER. Would the Senator from Wyoming be willing to insert a provision that the Secretary of Agriculture shall be precluded from the right of sending inspectors into the States or from appointing inspectors for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this clause? I think a provision of that sort would cover it.

Mr. WARREN. I would be unable to do that, because in some of the States, particularly in the Western States, in certain lines of business, they have inspectors; for instance, in connection with the scabies in sheep; and the States have invited the department to send inspectors in, and they have sent them in, acting in a way for both the State and the General Government.

Mr. RAYNER. But, Mr. President, they have no right to invite the Government to send inspectors into a State and the Government has no right to comply with such a request. That was this case. This was an invitation to governmental inspectors. I deny the right of any body of men to ask the Government—and I deny the right of the Government to accede to the request when made—to send inspectors into a State for the purpose of inspecting any commercial industry within the State.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator is rather vehement over the language I used, which was, perhaps, unfortunate.

Mr. RAYNER. I thought it was used with deliberation.

Mr. WARREN. The States provide that the United States inspectors under the quarantine which guards the lines of the States may work in harmony with the State and the States instruct their inspectors to work in harmony with the United States inspectors. To say that the United States inspectors shall not come into the State when they are guarding the lines of the State under the quarantine would be going further than I want to go.

Mr. RAYNER. That is entirely a voluntary arrangement——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. Just a word. That is entirely a voluntary arrangement. That is not an arrangement even under color of law. For instance, they have quarantined my State in reference to infectious diseases of cattle. I told the Secretary of Agriculture the other day that he did it in defiance of law; but he sent inspectors into Maryland for the purpose of killing cattle. I suppose he did it at the suggestion of the sanitary officers of my State; and he has practically until to-day quarantined the State of Maryland as a result of the inspection which he has made in the State of Maryland, and which he has no right to make.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in the confusion of the Senate, I can scarcely understand even the very forceful language of the Senator from Maryland.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. McCUMBER. It has never occurred to me, Mr. President, that an investigation necessarily meant the conducting of a particular business. It has never occurred to me that if we provide for the investigation of the ravages of insects upon cotton——

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to ask for order, because it is utterly impossible, even with the forceful expressions of the Senator from North Dakota, for me to understand what he says.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota will suspend until order is restored. [A pause.] The Senator from North Dakota will proceed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was saying, Mr. President, that it had never occurred to me that a paragraph in the law providing for the inspection of the ravages of insects upon cotton necessarily forces the Government into the raising of cotton or into the cotton business. Neither has it ever occurred to me in the slightest degree that a law which provides for the investigation of the transportation of adulterated or misbranded articles of food necessarily forces the Government into the manufacture of food products.

Mr. RAYNER. Just a word——

Mr. McCUMBER. Neither do I admit for a single moment that an investigation of the methods of grading and inspecting grain in vogue throughout the United States would necessarily force the Government into the act of grading and inspecting grain generally. All of these inspections can be carried on without any possible question without the Government entering in any way into the business itself. There are in this bill about half a hundred different provisions for investigations, and if the Senator's contentions were correct and the provisions referred to should remain in the bill the Government would go into about half a hundred different lines of production with which it has nothing whatever to do.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I consent to that proposition that such action would not necessarily embark the Government in this occupation; but that is not my point at all. My point is that by implication it gives the Government the power to embark in it if it wants to do so. My proposition is that when you give the right to investigate the handling and to fix the grade, you carry with it by implication the right of inspection—an unconstitutional power.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, not a bit more than when you give to the Government of the United States the right to investigate the methods of raising cotton you give it the right to go into the raising of cotton.

I would not take any time in the discussion of this matter did I not know to a certainty that the matter is one in which the entire Northwest is most vitally interested. It does seriously affect our interests. The present provision of the bill does not ask the Secretary of Agriculture to fix a standard of grades, to be followed by any one or at any one of the great terminals in this country. I do not understand that the old law is changed in the slightest degree. I have no objection whatever to the modification that has been suggested by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], for the reason that, as I contend, they mean exactly the same.

The Secretary can not make grades that will bind anyone unless he is limited in those grades to interstate commerce, and this bill does not pretend to limit him in any way, nor does it bind anyone to follow out the rules that he might make with reference to what would be a proper grade of any particular grain.

Mr. President, the State from which I come has by its legislature again and again petitioned Congress for a law providing for better inspection and grading of grain. The Tri-State Grain Growers' Association, consisting of grain growers of the States of North and South Dakota and Minnesota, has again and again passed resolutions in favor of such a provision. The American Society of Equity, representing the producing element in this country, has again and again resolved in favor of the better inspection of grain. I am ready to take up that question and consider it from the legal standpoint and from any other standpoint whenever the Senate gets ready to discuss that proposition. But it is not in the bill before us to-day.

The provision before us to-day simply seeks to allow the Secretary to proceed with the same investigations that he has been making in the past few years, which investigations have very materially assisted us in securing proper grades at the great terminals, over which we have no control whatever.

In order to show to the Senate just exactly what the farmer has to contend with in his dealings at the great terminals, I am going to ask the Secretary to read a little portion from the hearings that were taken before the Committee on Agriculture. Let me again make this one point clear, that all grain is sold by grades; that the value of grain to the farmer does not depend so much upon its actual quality as upon the grade that is fixed upon that grain at some great terminal point; and as the grade fixed at the terminal points fixes the price that will be paid in the field of consumption, therefore that grade, by reaction, always fixes the value of the particular grade in the field of production. If the grades that are fixed upon the grain at the great terminals are below the actual grade—for in selling the grades are really higher than they actually are—then they force a value less than the actual value in the field of consumption, which, by reaction, fixes a lower valuation of the higher grade in the field of production. Any one acquainted with the commerce of the country will know this rule to be absolutely correct.

Having made that statement, I want to speak a little of the methods that are in vogue in the different terminal sections of this country. It has been stated again and again, and properly stated, that, after all, the value of our grain is fixed by the foreign demand, and that Liverpool and other great central points of consumption fix the price of the product in this country. I admit that is absolutely true. I make the statement that the practice is almost universal at every one of our ports of export to send abroad adulterated grain, much below the real grade that is fixed upon it; so that grain that ought to have been certified from the port of Baltimore or New York or New Orleans, we will say, as No. 3 or No. 4, is certified as No. 1 or No. 2. The purchaser on the other side ascertaining that the American No. 1 and No. 2 do not measure up to the American standard of No. 1 and No. 2, will only pay a No. 3 or a No. 4 price for those grades, and that price, by reaction, always fixes the price again at the point of consumption.

We have no power whatever over the grade of grain at these great terminals. There ought to be some forum where every man, the producer, the consumer, or the middleman, could be heard as to the matter of grade. If the producers in Texas or Kansas or the Dakotas are satisfied that the methods of handling grain in Chicago or New Orleans are inimical to their interests, there ought to be some forum where they can be heard. They can not be heard at these terminals, and in most cases at the terminal points there are no great agricultural interests whatever. As a result, every rule or law is made in favor of the purchaser and against the producer.

Let me call the attention of the Senator from Maryland to some of the evidence that was taken before the Agricultural Committee. It appears as a fact that is given to us—I can not vouch for the truth of the fact, except that it is given in the testimony before the Committee on Agriculture—that the Board of Trade of Baltimore were quite anxious to divert the export trade of grain from New York to Baltimore. Especially was this true in reference to corn. They made special bids; they gave perhaps pretty good grades, and they got an immense amount of grain, which otherwise would have gone to the port of New York. After they got loaded up it was found that they could not handle that grain to advantage without considerable loss. The only thing that was left to them to do to prevent that loss was to raise the grade of all of the corn that was in that city at that time one or two grades, and unload it upon the foreign purchaser at a grade or two higher than it was purchased.

Mr. RAYNER. Just a moment——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. On behalf of the Baltimore Board of Trade I must absolutely deny the truth of that statement. I do not know what witness testified to it. I want to say, furthermore, to the Senator from North Dakota—I do not know whether or not he is a member of the Agricultural Committee—that the Board of Trade of Baltimore contends that it was denied a hearing before that committee. Whether or not it had any hearing I am unable to say; but it asked for a hearing, and it was told that a hearing would be afforded, but that hearing was never had; and the board has sent a protest to the committee denying, among other things, the very statement the Senator from North Dakota makes. I do not want that statement to go into the RECORD uncontradicted, for the board of trade of my city consists of some of its most prominent and distinguished citizens.

Mr. McCUMBER. I say again that all I can go by is the testimony that was taken before the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. RAYNER. The Baltimore Board of Trade was not allowed to contradict it.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the statement before the committee appears to be supplemented by the evidence of the foreign purchasers claiming exactly the same character of fraud was perpetrated upon them. I can not say what denials have been made. I know that the board was represented, as was every other one of these great boards interested in the purchase of the farmer's wheat for a less grade than it is entitled to, and interested in selling it at one or two grades higher than it is entitled to. The attorneys were here; they had their hearing, and it was closed before we put in any evidence whatever on behalf of the farmers throughout the United States. Great lobbies and attorneys have been here to protect the interests of these great purchasers. The farmers are not sufficiently organized to-day to make their wants felt, but I desire to say to the Senate of the United States to-day that that organization is going on and the time is not very far distant when what they desire and what they believe to be for their interests will be listened to by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. I merely want to remind the Senator that we heard the same kind of talk in the old Alliance days, and they did send some men to the House and the Senate, but they could not in this American country induce the farmers of the United States to demand special privileges for themselves any more than they want special privileges granted to other people.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would ask the Senator if he considers that a demand for honest and efficient grading is a demand for a special privilege? That is their demand to-day—not for special laws in their favor, but for the honest grading of grain throughout the United States, and that it shall be graded, not by the man who is the purchaser of the grain or some one appointed by him, but graded by those who are capable and who are under no influence whatever that would tend to make them deviate in the slightest degree from what is absolutely right in fixing the standards.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not think one man ought to cheat another in buying grain or in selling cotton or in trading horses; but if they do it, I do not think it is a matter of federal concern. I should leave them first to themselves and their consciences and the contempt of their neighbors; and when they were not sufficient to effect a reform, I would at least not go beyond the police power of the States to suppress swindling.

Mr. McCUMBER. My question was whether or not the agricultural interests of this country were asking for special privileges when they are demanding that they have facilities for the honest grading and inspection of their grain.

Mr. BAILEY. And my answer is——

Mr. McCUMBER. That is what they are demanding; that is what I am speaking for, and for nothing more; and I will show the Senate in a very short time that they have not been getting honest and proper grades for their grain.

Mr. BAILEY. And my answer to that is that when any class or any occupation comes to the American Congress and asks it to interfere with the details of conditions of any occupation within a State, it is not only asking for a special privilege, but it is demanding of us that we violate the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not in the slightest degree. We never violate the Constitution of the United States when we pass a law that is sanctioned by the Constitution which will protect the people against fraud in any manner. That is all we are asking for in this particular instance. The same philosophy would apply to the railroad rate bill.

Mr. BAILEY. O Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. In just a moment. The Senator might just as well say——

Mr. BAILEY. I want to say to the Senator——

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator might just as well say that if the transportation companies doing an interstate business saw fit to exact from any section of this country more than they ought to, we should leave the matter entirely outside of legislation and let them fight it out to their best advantage.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. McCUMBER. No; in just one moment. But the principle is this: When the conditions are such that it becomes necessary for the Government itself to exercise those functions which it can exercise for the protection of a people who have no other rights than those which they can secure from the Congress, then it becomes the moral duty of the Congress to give them that protection.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. McCUMBER. Always.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator had yielded to me a little sooner, I would have saved him the mistake he has made in the heat of debate. When the Senator from North Dakota reads his remarks wherein he sought to draw an analogy between the regulation of railroad rates and the regulation of the purchase and sale of private commodities by private individuals, he will at least regret having incorporated that statement in his remarks.

The Senator knows—and no Senator knows it better than he does—that the power not only of the Federal Government, but the power of the state government over a transportation company is essentially different from its power over private transactions; and when the Senator attempts to put those of us who oppose a governmental interference with private transactions in the attitude of likewise opposing the governmental regulation of a public-service corporation he does no credit to his candor.

Mr. McCUMBER. The power of the Congress of the United States over a transportation company is derived from the general power of Congress to control interstate commerce; and the power to determine what may enter into interstate commerce and the rules and regulations which shall govern that article as it passes through that commerce both come from exactly the same source—from that single provision in the Constitution. The one is no broader than the other. The only question is whether or not the Congress of the United States has power to enact a law which will govern the grading of certain commodities to prevent fraud being practiced upon either the producer or the purchaser or the consumer.

I do not think the Senator from Texas will deny the right of Congress to intervene for that purpose so long as the subject is an article of interstate commerce.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from North Dakota further permit me?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. We can bring this matter to a test from which no skill in argument can extricate the man who is wrong. The Senator from North Dakota agrees with me perfectly that Congress can fix the rates which transportation companies shall charge on interstate commerce. Does the Senator from North Dakota maintain that the Government of the United States can fix the price of grain?

Mr. McCUMBER. There is no such thing contemplated or hinted at in any way.

Mr. BAILEY. I know that.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will ask me a question within the bounds of reason, I shall be ready to answer it.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought it was rather beyond reason, but I was following the Senator, and I had to follow him out of the realm of reasonable inquiry. I only wanted to accentuate the fact that there is all the difference in the world between the power of Congress over the question of interstate transportation, as well as the power of the State over intrastate transportation, and the power of either of them or both over the private transactions of individuals.

Mr. McCUMBER. Congress has power to determine whether or not certain explosives shall be transported from one State to another. It has a right to fix the rules for the handling of those explosives, how they shall be boxed and packed, and so forth. All of this is done for the purpose of protecting the individual against injury. Congress has also the power to say that there shall not enter into interstate commerce certain articles which are falsely branded, so as to deceive. Congress has the same right to say that a load of grain shall not be certified as No. 3 under certain rules, when, as a matter of fact, it would pass as rejected under those rules, and would therefore operate to deceive and defraud the purchaser. That is as far as I contend we have the right to go, and I claim we have that right without any possible question.

Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] seemed quite desirous of having read before the Senate the case to which he referred several times. No one has denied the proposition laid down in that particular case. No one has had the temerity to assert that the agents of the Agricultural Department can go into a State, can take possession, can grade, can inspect, or handle in any way an article of commerce before it enters into interstate commerce; and that is all that this case holds.

But, Mr. President, I stated that I was going to ask for the reading of a part of the testimony, so as to bring right home to the Senate the difficulties we have to contend with, and to show that there ought to be some forum where the farmer, the agriculturist of the different States, can seek redress as against a fraud perpetrated upon him in another State. I will ask the Secretary to read from pages 11 and 12 the portions in quotations. I will state that the testimony which I ask to have read is that of a member of the Board of Trade of the City of Chicago, who for seventeen years has been engaged in handling and selling grain upon the board, and his evidence is directly in reference to the grades that are allowed in that section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

There is not a grain man in the world familiar with this market who will buy a public warehouse grain receipt and remove that grain from storage under any circumstances without an absolute knowledge of the grain he is going to get from that elevator. The standards of the public warehouse receipts are in disrepute simply on account of this system and the inspection department, which places the whole value on those receipts.

* * * * * * *

I have handled tens of thousands of cars in the board of trade. I have stood in front of one sample table for seventeen years as a handler of grain. I have sampled hundreds of thousands of carloads on the floor and noted the inspection, and I am free to admit that there is not a grain merchant of standing who is not either friendly to or affiliated with this organization (the organization of great grain buyers) who will state either under oath or otherwise that a public warehouse grain receipt under the management of this public elevator trust and the state inspection department is worthy of the respect of any man in the trade.

* * * * * * *

Why, sir, no man ever thinks of buying grain out of a public elevator or taking grain out of almost any place unless he has one of his private representatives, at his own expense, come up here and pay the bill and have the grain examined before it is loaded into the car or boat. We all have our private examiners and inspectors to watch the grain. We have to be on guard at every moment. There is nothing about an inspection certificate in this city but a huge joke.

* * * * * * *

Another witness testified:

"There are grades in our market of No. 2 and No. 3 yellow corn. These elevator companies also had private elevators, which were not under the control of the state inspection. They would buy both grades to go to store and sell the No. 2 yellow in New England. I noticed from the inspection sheets that these companies very rarely inspected any yellow corn out of store. It always came out No. 2. And I noticed I had that competition to meet at the other end from the elevator companies. In other words, they adulterated their goods, to be plain. They didn't give the trade East what they claimed to, although they gave them the inspection certificate of out inspection.

"I have stated that these men deal in grain and deal in such a way that it operates to the detriment of the shipper, to the detriment of the buyer, and to the detriment of the speculative public, and that their ally and their chief assistant is the state inspection department."

Another witness testified:

"The present inspection at Chicago, which is our principal market, and upon which we must depend at most times, is absolutely unreliable and without any stability whatever. As a proof of this, I want to tell you that in our country we have a variety of oats known as the 'Russian green oats;' also an oat known as the 'Kerson oat.' They are of a yellow variety. These oats, upon arriving in Chicago, no matter how sweet or bright or clean or nice they are, are invariably marked 'stained and damaged' in the inspection certificate, while an inferior quality of white oats might pass the inspection as No. 3 white, as compared with these yellow oats. We have been contending with that condition for the last five years. In view of the fact that many foreign countries buy our grain and we are heavy exporters, we contend that it would be a good thing to offer them a definite basis on which they can base their business relations with us, and we also contend that the federal inspection would perform that service."

Again, he says:

"Other cities are just as bad. It is possible to-day for a commission man to go to an inspector upon the exchange and have a sample of No. 4 white oats changed and marked from No. 4 white to No. 3 white without the formality of a resampling."

Mr. McCUMBER. The same witness goes on and shows another condition in that city which would be interesting to any Senator who has not already made up his mind upon this proposition, and certainly interesting to those who are unacquainted with the methods of handling grain. He shows, for instance, that five persons own from half to three-quarters of all the grain-elevator capacity in one of the greatest cities in the United States, and they purchase the farmer's grain at as low a grade as possible and put it into their own private elevators, then mix it up with still lower grades, then put it back into the public elevators and certify it from those elevators out one or two grades higher than it is entitled to.

Now, all of the grain being sold for future delivery under the rules must be purchased upon the certificates at those terminal points. When the time arrives to have these certificates delivered and the grain turned over to the purchaser, the purchaser knows that the grain certified out as No. 2 is a poor quality of No. 3, and he will refuse to accept it, because he knows he can not sell it. He therefore is compelled to liquidate, as they call it in the trade; that is, sell out at a loss. The owners of these great elevators stand ready to buy it in at the depreciated price. Then they resell for another future delivery, and when the time comes around again for the same reason the purchaser will refuse to accept the grain at that grade. They buy it in again at another loss to the previous purchaser, and so continue this endless chain.

Now, what effect has that upon the market at home? It has this effect: Every Senator knows that the price of a commodity is determined by the visible supply. There will be shown to be a very large visible supply of grain of contract grade, when, in fact, there is not one-tenth as much in that city. If the true facts were known what the visible supply was, it would be known that there would not be enough grain at that locality to meet the demand. The result would be that it would send the prices upward to a considerable extent. This method of handling grain, as I have indicated, operates always to drive down the price to the producer. How would that be remedied? If we had federal inspection which would show exactly what the grain in the elevator was and that it was of a lower quality than it was certified out, then the natural result would be that it would raise the value of all the grain throughout the country.

There has been read—many Senators possibly were not paying attention to it—the fact that in the State of Iowa they raise what is called a "yellow oat," a splendid oat. They have the Chicago market, and for years they have always gotten a certificate upon those oats that they were colored and spoiled. They could not get the honest grade upon them, although they were superior in many instances to the white oat.

Let me give one other example of inefficiency. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this fact in the matter of grading.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am interested in the matter of the farmer getting a just and reasonable price for his product, and I should like to ask the Senator a question. Is there no method by which grain or cotton, having entered into interstate commerce and been shipped from the State producing it and gotten into the central markets, like Chicago and New York, can be inspected and a certificate as to its grade or quality be attached so that there will be a protection to the producer, if not directly—supposing he did not ship it—then indirectly by the effect on the price? Is it not possible to do that without undertaking to invade a State and to inspect and grade the product at the shipping point?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no. I do not know of any other way whereby it is possible to do it.

Mr. TILLMAN. The complaint is always at the receiving point.

Mr. McCUMBER. Always.

Mr. TILLMAN. There is no trouble at the point of departure or production. It is always the rascal in New York or Chicago who is endeavoring to undergrade the cotton of the man in South Carolina or the grain of the man in North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why do you go to the wrong end to inspect instead of going to the right end?

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator had been listening to the argument, he would have found out that he is in error in making that remark. That is just exactly where I am going. I want to go to the port of New York and to the other great terminals and do the grading there as the article enters into those terminals before it is unloaded and while it is still interstate commerce.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why do you want to investigate a thing that is well understood?

Mr. McCUMBER. And then have the grade put on it by the Government, an honest grade, and that grade will follow it throughout to the field of consumption, and that grading will encourage those who want to give the farmer or the producer of cotton or grain the grade his product is entitled to, to do so.

Mr. TILLMAN. The methods of these robbers in New York in dealing with cotton are so fully understood now that we do not need to investigate. So it is, as the Senator has just shown by the letter he had read, in regard to grain, oats, and so forth, in Chicago. Why do we want to run to the wrong end of this thing to remedy it when the plain facts lie before us, and all we have to do is to provide for such inspection of articles already entered into interstate commerce—cotton and other farm products—at the ports of shipment?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is exactly what my bill provides.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do you mean this amendment?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; but the matter we have been discussing, upon the right and the duty of the Government to grade in interstate commerce.

Mr. TILLMAN. But you want to grade it at the wrong end. I want to grade it at the place where the product has already gotten out of intrastate commerce and become a subject of interstate commerce. When the cotton gets to New York, let us grade it there; when the grain gets to Chicago, let us grade it there; and do not let us go back to Iowa and Dakota to do it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I agree with the Senator, and I gave it as one reason why I thought the amendment which went out on the point of order was absolutely useless. The Senator does not disagree with me at all as to the proper place to begin the work.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not understand the Senator's argument at all. But from what I have been able to hear of the contention of the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Texas, they object to your entering into the State of production and undertaking to inspect and grade it there. They do not object, as I understand, to having the United States Government inspect and grade and protect by any legislation possible here after it has reached the point of delivery.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, yes; they object to grading at any period or at any time.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Would the producers of cotton in South Carolina be willing to have a clerk in the New York custom-house fix the price of cotton for the planters of his State?

Mr. TILLMAN. The price is not what we are discussing; it is the grade.

Mr. ALDRICH. When he fixes the grade, he fixes the price.

Mr. TILLMAN. It depends entirely on whether the man in the custom-house in New York is an honest man or some deadbeat politician, who is to be put into the position in order to get the salary.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from South Carolina knows as well as I do what kind of a man he is likely to be.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I do not want anything to do with such cattle.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator from South Carolina and also the Senator from Rhode Island will agree that they would rather have a clerk under the provisions of the law relative to the appointment of clerks for the Government, if he was under the civil service, to certify it than to have a man appointed by the purchaser to certify it. I think the chances are a thousand to one that we would get nearer an honest certification if we had an independent person to certify it than if we selected one who was appointed by the purchaser and who wants to have it certified as low as possible. I think that is an answer to that.

I want to show another very bad condition that we have to meet by having no way of revising or going over the methods of grading at the terminal points. In this same document, the testimony that was taken before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, there is one statement which affects all of the great terminal points at certain seasons of the year. One man inspected in less than half a day 250 cars of grain. That meant that he had to walk down one side for 2½ miles and walk up the other side for 2½ miles and inspect from both sides. That was a physical——

Mr. TILLMAN. Who did that?

Mr. McCUMBER. This was one of the graders in the city of Chicago.

Mr. TILLMAN. In whose employ?

Mr. McCUMBER. Under the employ of the board of trade.

Mr. TILLMAN. And they were managing and manipulating it in order to steal the farmer's grain at a lower price than they ought to have paid?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am letting the Senator draw the conclusion. I am giving the fact.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am talking plain English and the Senator is using "shenanegan."

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not call it "shenanegan." I am giving the fact, and I will let the Senator draw any conclusion and apply any kind of language he sees fit. But the fact remains that one inspector in half a day inspected 250 cars. The fact is apparent that he could not do any more than make a rough guess, and that those 250 cars of grain must therefore necessarily be sold under 250 guesses. Is not that true? Now, remembering that this inspector is employed by the man who is purchasing that grain, are not the chances that the guesses will be in his favor, and not in favor of the producer?

Mr. President, I do not want to discuss this matter any further than is necessary. I simply want to allow the Secretary of Agriculture to go on with his investigations. I want him to investigate—I do not care what language you put it in—the methods of grading in the different sections of the United States. That he has done so has helped us out very materially. As I said yesterday, we are getting better grades because the great terminal points know that the Secretary of Agriculture is watching their operation, and if it is carried on to such an extent that it becomes too gross a robbery the publicity that will be given to it will be such as to insure a federal inspection of grain.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. WARREN. Presuming that the committee has a right to perfect the amendment, I wish to withdraw the amendment I sent to the desk a few moments ago and to offer it in a different form, commencing in line 9, after the word "and," and inserting what I send to the desk, beginning with the word "for."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 9, after the word "and," insert:

For a study of the factors entering into the usual operations connected therewith, $52,440.

Mr. JOHNSTON. How would it then read?

Mr. WARREN. Let the whole clause be read as it will then read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the clause as it would read if amended as proposed.

The Secretary read as follows:

For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain and for a study of the factors entering into the usual operations connected therewith, $52,440.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 18, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty thousand five hundred and thirty" and insert "twenty-three thousand one hundred and eighty," so as to make the clause read:

For the investigation and improvement of methods of growing, producing, and handling tobacco, $23,180.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 19, after the word "by," to insert "cultural methods," so as to make the clause read:

For the improvement of cotton by cultural methods, breeding, and selection, $18,130.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 1, before the word "breeding," to insert "testing and," so as to make the clause read:

For testing and breeding fibrous plants, which may be used for paper making, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 3, after the word "breeding," to insert "and physiological study," so as to make the clause read:

For the breeding and physiological study of alkali-resistant and drought-resistant crops, $17,550.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 16, after the word "weevil," to strike out "$146,470" and insert "$250,000," of which sum "$50,000 shall be immediately available," so as to make the clause read:

For the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil, $250,000, of which sum $50,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one hundred and two thousand two hundred and sixty-six" and insert "two hundred and fifty-eight thousand three hundred and fifty-six," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $1,258,356.

Mr. WARREN. I move to add, after the word "dollars," in line 7:

Of which sum $50,000 shall be immediately available for cotton boll weevil work.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 20, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy-two" and insert "forty-one," so as to read:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For the purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, fuel, transportation, paper, twine, gum, postal cards, gas, and electric current, official traveling expenses, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same; for rent and repairs and the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $317,960, of which amount not less than $241,320 shall be allotted for congressional distribution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds, on page 22, line 17, after the word "plants," to insert the following additional proviso:

Provided also, That $31,000 of which sum, or so much thereof as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct, shall be used in the propagation, testing, distribution, and extension of forage crops throughout the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 10, before the word "dollars," to strike out "six hundred and thirty thousand seven hundred and thirty-six" and insert "seven hundred and eighty-six thousand eight hundred and twenty-six," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Plant Industry, $1,786,826.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Forest Service," in the item for general expenses, Forest Service, on page 25, line 14, before the word "hundred," to strike out "three million nine" and insert "four million four," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the exportation of dead and insect-infested timber only from said Black Hills National Forest shall be allowed until such time as the Forester shall certify that the ravages of the destructive insects in said forests are practically checked, but in no case after July 1, 1910; to transport and care for fish and game supplied to stock the national forests or the waters therein; to employ fiscal and other agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in practical forestry and in the administration of national forests, in the city of Washington and elsewhere; to collate, digest, report, and illustrate the results of experiments and investigations made by the Forest Service; to purchase law books to an amount not exceeding $500, necessary supplies, apparatus, and office fixtures, and technical books and technical journals for officers of the Forest Service stationed outside of Washington; to pay freight, express, telephone, and telegraph charges; for electric light and power, fuel, gas, ice, washing towels, and official traveling and other necessary expenses; and for rent in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $4,486,000.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill why the amount for the Forest Service is proposed to be increased $500,000?

Mr. WARREN. The committee, in view of the fact that the estimate called for some thirteen hundred thousand dollars more than the amount given by the House, and the further fact that the Senate by its vote last year added $500,000, concluded that the service needed the $500,000 additional, and that it would probably be acceptable to the Senate, and perhaps to the House in conference.

Mr. HEYBURN. Had the Secretary read to the proviso in line 15?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary read to that point. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. Would the Senator from Idaho as soon let the amendment be unacted on and go on and let the Secretary read about a page more?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will be pleased to do that; and then I will take the floor.

Mr. WARREN. The pending amendment may be laid aside and the Secretary can finish the reading of the items for the Forestry Service.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over for the present.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, and read to page 26, line 11.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6484) to establish postal savings banks for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 26, after line 11, to insert:

That hereafter, for the purpose of unifying national forests, the Secretary of the Interior may, upon the request of the Secretary of Agriculture, accept relinquishments to private lands lying within the exterior limits of any one of such forests in exchange for stumpage of substantially equal value from the national forests. And such private lands, upon the acceptance of relinquishments thereto by the Secretary of the Interior, shall become a part of the national forests within the exterior limits of which, respectively, they lie, and be subject to the laws then and thereafter affecting the same.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President, after a time, if there be a desire to adopt the amendment just read, I give notice that I shall interpose the point of order against it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, for a number of years we have been promised on each succeeding occasion as we reached this appropriation bill that in a very short time there would be no longer occasion to ask for an appropriation for the maintenance of the Forestry Service, for the reason that it would be self-sustaining, and I think that that promise has had more to do with the expanding and the development of this vicious measure than almost anything else.

I sincerely hope that we are standing at the threshold of better governmental conditions, where the law enacted pursuant to the Constitution will help the will of the people, rather than rules and regulations made at the will or caprice of the employees of the Government temporarily invested with the execution of the law.

Mr. President, this appropriation bill has been carved out of an estimate made by the Forestry Service, speaking through its chief, the Agricultural Department, an estimate for this year of $6,071,500. I find that on page 35 of the estimates of this department.

The bill carries an appropriation of $5,146,200. It carries it in three items. The first item is of $60,000 for the office expenses in Washington; the second is of $4,486,000 for grouped necessities; the third is of $600,000 for improvements of national forests; the total is $5,146,200.

Last year we appropriated $3,978,616. The bill this year carries in excess of the bill of last year $1,167,584. The income from all sources for the last fiscal year was $1,842,281.87. So the deficiency in this service would be $3,303,918.13.

Mr. President, that is the criterion by which we are to estimate the ability of this branch of the government service to conduct a business enterprise. This service, that was going to be self-sustaining by this year, shows a deficit, in round numbers, of $3,300,000.

Two years ago the appropriation was $3,759,086; for the present year it was $3,978,616.97. The estimate for this coming year, for which we are now making appropriations, is $6,071,500. So in two years the expense of conducting this department of the Government has more than doubled.

I have only included that portion of the time since the law was changed requiring them to cover into the Treasury of the United States the receipts from the Forestry Service.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BURKETT. The Senator in making that statement, complaining that the prophecy or the promise that this department would become self-sustaining in a year or two or in a little while, and that it had not done so this year, ought to incorporate also the statement that during that time, under the direction of Congress, we have been extending the work of this department, and while the income has not exceeded the expense it has been because we have been increasing the service. We have been imposing upon this bureau other additional work. We have been extending it in various directions. After all, it has been a very few years, comparatively speaking, since we have undertaken to do anything looking to the preservation and the protection of the timber. While the expenses are temporarily large in comparison with the income, it is only because we are getting ready for the proper care of it, and while they have continued to be larger for a year or two longer than was anticipated, it has been because Congress in its wisdom has determined to do it in a larger way and on a more extensive plan than was originally contemplated when it was thought that it would get on a paying basis within a year or two.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question. Is the Senator aware of a single duty additional laid upon this bureau that has not been laid upon it by the actual request of the bureau itself?

Mr. BURKETT. I did not hear the last part of the Senator's question.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask the Senator if he is aware of any duty that has been laid upon this bureau enlarging its scope that has not been granted at the absolute request of the bureau itself?

Mr. BURKETT. I will say to the Senator that I suspect it would be impossible to pass anything through here that a bureau of the Government had not indorsed.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is not my question. I asked the Senator——

Mr. BURKETT. I want to answer the Senator's question. I recall that when anything comes in here the very first question that is usually asked is, Does the department recommend it? That is a very appropriate question, because they are supposed to investigate these matters. Their opinion is supposed to be made up without local prejudice. Very naturally, therefore, when Congress is all the time trying to seek and find out what the will of the department is before passing legislation, Congress followed the advice and the suggestion of this department that is spending its time in this special line of work.

I want to say to the Senator that, in my opinion, we ought to congratulate ourselves and the country that we have at the head of that bureau a man not only of sufficient qualifications and capacity, but of sufficient energy and faithfulness to execute the trust which is reposed in him. It is the most phenomenal thing, I think, in the whole government service, for it has been demonstrated that there has been no more faithful work than that done by the head of this bureau. I think that we are quite fortunate that we have had at the head of the bureau one who was able to grasp the situation, to mold legislation, so to speak, and to suggest a plan for the preservation and protection of our forests, which Congress, in its wisdom, has adopted in times past, and has seen fit to use for the preservation of these forests.

In answering the Senator, I will say frankly that I do not know that there is, in anything that has been done, a single idea that has come from Congress; "pity 'tis 'tis true;" pity 'tis that there has not something good come out the ideas of Senators from those particular States and other States, who are certainly all interested in this matter. But, in my opinion, it is no argument against what has been done, simply because it originated with a man who has spent his whole life in the study of methods and plans and possibilities for the development of American timber culture.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator from Wyoming to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am seeking information from the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator desires me to answer, I will say that I can call his attention, I think, to two cases where lands have been added to the forest reserves that were not requested by the Forestry Service.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That was not my question.

Mr. SMOOT. That was the Senator's question, as I understood it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, no. The Senator, in speaking of the increased expenditures and the excess of the expenditures over receipts, made the statement that it undoubtedly arose because of the larger and wider duties that we laid upon this bureau. My question was, whether the Senator knew of any wide duty that Congress had laid upon this service that had not been requested by the service itself; in other words, whatever increased expenditure has come, has come along lines that have been distinctly asked for by the service itself, and not initiated by Congress, which legislates about these matters.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I will answer that question.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to have an answer.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was just proceeding—it was directly in the line of what I was saying, and I should like to continue it——

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield at any time to the Senator, but I was discussing that question. I will give some information as to the class of service for which the additional appropriation is asked. The bill under consideration contains, practically in the same language as the estimates, these items. I will call attention to them. They are instructive and they are a fair sample of the manner in which this department does business.

General expenses, forest service: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to experiment and to make and continue investigations and report on forestry—

That is one item. We are not advised how much of the money is to be expended for that purpose, whether it is all of this $4,000,000 or a very small portion of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I take it that the Senator from Idaho has examined the estimates of the department, and there he will find set out in detail just what the expenses are.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I have the matter before me on my desk, but I can not concede the statement of the Senator. If I am allowed to continue my statement, it will be made plain why it is not possible——

Mr. SMOOT. The only reason I answered that was that the Senator said he did not know what the $4,600,000 was intended for, it being but one of many items.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will submit the question to the Senator from Utah. He has the estimates there. How much money is appropriated for the item "to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to experiment and to make and continue investigations and report on forestry"—that item alone?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the estimates that are given here are given under that heading in districts. I can not say offhand precisely what the amount is, but I will be able to tell the Senator in a little while.

Mr. HEYBURN. I presume I have gone through the statement by districts; I have it in my hand, and by the time I have finished my statement I think my criticism will be plain and obvious. That is the first item. You can go through the estimates to any extent and you will not be able to answer the question that I have submitted to the Senator from Utah.

The next item is, "National forests; forest fires." I should like to know how much of the $4,000,000 is to be devoted to national forests and forest fires?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I remember—I have not recently examined it—for forest fires there is an estimate of $500,000. By the way, I think it ought to be a great deal more than $500,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, another item is—

To advise the owners of woodlands as to the proper care of the same.

I wonder how much money is appropriated for that item—"to advise the owners of woodlands as to the proper care of the same." Where? Private owners of woodlands?

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what it is, to advise private owners as to how they shall take care of their forests.

Mr. HEYBURN. The provision continues:

To investigate and test American timber and timber trees and their uses, and methods for the preservative treatment of timber; to seek, through investigations and the planting of native and foreign species, suitable trees for the treeless regions; to erect necessary buildings: Provided, That the cost of any building erected shall not exceed $500.

I want to say a word about these buildings. My attention was called to that item on more than one occasion during the last summer and fall. I saw instances—and I have the papers to establish the facts with some detail—where, under the plea of necessity of the Forestry Service, the forestry officers took possession of men's homes and dispossessed the men from them because they were within the boundaries of the forest reserves, saying that they needed them for forestry purposes. There is one instance of that kind that is worthy of more than passing notice. I want to read it. I think Senators will be interested in this well-authenticated case. This was the case of a man by the name of Osker E. Moyer.

He had a homestead in the Lewiston land district.

There is a forest station adjoining Mr. Moyer's homestead, and there has been constant friction between the forest officers and Moyer for the past two years. The chief trouble has been caused by the forest rangers trying to collect stumpage from Moyer for the wood cut in clearing his land. Moyer proved up last September, after five years' residence, to escape the everlasting interference of the forest rangers, some of whom are immensely impressed with their own importance—

I am reading from a letter—and seem anxious to distinguish themselves by a conspicuous display of official watchfulness.

Not satisfied with contesting, or protesting, Moyer's homestead, the forest officers practically drove him off of his place, forbade him to do any work thereon, and served notice on him not to remove his wood then cut until after patent should be issued to him. They then tacked a notice on each pile of his wood, one of which I send you—

This is the notice [exhibiting] printed upon cloth. It reads:

PROPERTY OF THE
UNITED STATES.

For the use of the officers of the Forest Service. All persons are prohibited, under penalty of the law, from committing any trespass.

JAMES WILSON,
Secretary of Agriculture.

The letter says one of these notices was tacked on each pile of this man's wood.

He allowed the wood to remain until after he received the decision inclosed.

The inclosed decision is one giving him his homestead in the contest which he now has by virtue of the proceedings.

I then advised him to haul his wood to Grangeville, and the forest officers have since relinquished or released it from their claim.

Moyer is a poor man, with a large family, and it has occurred to me that a bill for his relief on account of the damage sustained by this groundless protest might be passed. He has been damaged about $250, $100 of which is cash paid out. He had to sell his best cow to get part of the funds to fight with.

There is a well-authenticated case. Attached to it is the decision holding that this man was a legitimate and bona fide homesteader; that this was his homestead, and passing it, so far as the office may pass it, for patent. That is a sample of what is being done. I could produce similar cases here in numbers to occupy the attention of the Senate for a day or two.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely want to ask the Senator if the man's homestead was within or without the limits of a forest reservation? I did not quite get that information from the letter which the Senator read.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have before me the protest in the case of Osker E. Moyer. This is an official paper of the Department. This is a very recent case.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES LAND OFFICE,
Lewiston, Idaho, October 28, 1908.

OSKER E. MOYER, Grangeville, Idaho:

By authority of General Land Office letter "P," of October 23, 1908, you are hereby notified that an officer of the Forest Service office has filed the following charges against the validity of your homestead entry No. 10044, made July 13, 1903——

Mr. SMOOT. But what I wanted to know was whether the homestead was within the limits of a forest reserve; that is all.

Mr. HEYBURN. To answer that question I would have to take a map and compare the description, but it is not material. I am speaking of the conduct of the forestry officers.

Mr. SMOOT. It will make a great deal of difference, in my view of the case, as to whether the land was within a reserve or whether it was without.

Mr. HEYBURN. I presume it will.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the senior Senator from Idaho yield to the junior Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. If it is not within a forest reserve, what right would a man have to file any protest?

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever. That is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not know what impression it will make upon the Senator from Utah. I will have to leave that entirely to his judgment. But I am now stating some facts from which I will draw some deductions, and perhaps other Senators will do the same.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Would the Senator be kind enough to state what the ground of the protest of the forestry officer was?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; and I have the judgment of the court here, too. The grounds stated are:

To wit:

"1. That claimant has never cultivated any of the land.

"2. That claimant did not make the entry in good faith for the purpose of securing the land for a home, but for speculative purposes to secure the timber thereon."

He had been living on the land for five years.

I am reading from the charges, which the officer finds unfounded.

This is a new device that they have conjured up—this thing of taking possession of a man's buildings and home within the forest reserve under the claim that they are necessary for the use of the forestry officers.

At Atlanta—and I will not take the time of the Senate to read all these letters—they moved into a man's homestead and are occupying it to-day, as they allege, for administrative purposes in connection with the Forestry Service. I saw last summer, between Council and Evergreen on the railroad going up through Washington County, a beautiful set of buildings on a bank overlooking the river that were being used by the officers of the Forestry Service under the same claim. They had taken them, claiming that they were necessary for administrative purposes. They have done that in so many cases that it would be impossible to stand here and enumerate them all.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not catch the name in the last case. I want to say, so far as my experience goes, that it has been just the reverse of that of the Senator, because they have written to me and asked that I use my influence with the Forestry Service to buy their homes for that very purpose.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, individuals have written?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. They were not so thoughtful in the other cases.

Mr. President, the Forestry Service has taken possession of 20,000,000 acres, in round figures, in the State of Idaho. They admit that 9,000,000 acres of that land is absolutely untimbered. Congress in providing for the setting aside of forest reserves placed these limitations upon them:

All public lands heretofore designated and reserved by the President of the United States under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1891, the orders for which shall be and remain in full force and effect, unsuspended and unrevoked, and all public lands that may hereafter be set aside and reserved as public forest reserves under said act shall be, as far as practicable, controlled and administered in accordance with the following provisions:

Mark you—

No public forest reservation shall be established except to improve and protect the forest within the reservation, or for the purpose of securing favorable conditions of water flows, and to furnish a continuous supply of timber for the use and necessities of citizens of the United States; but it is not the purpose or intent of these provisions, or the act providing for such reservations, to authorize the inclusion therein of lands more valuable for the mineral therein, or for agricultural purposes, than for forest purposes.

And yet they have included within the forest reserves in the State of Idaho nearly every great mining camp in that State.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I understood the Senator from Idaho to say that it is admitted by the Forestry Bureau that large areas untimbered and not adapted to timber are included in the forest reserves. Did I misunderstand him?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; they state that.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I call the matter up because the Chief of the Forestry Bureau testified before the committee that he knew of no forest reservation that contained any land except that which has timber upon it or had timber cut from it or was well adapted to the growing of timber. To use his exact language, he said, in answer to a question of Senator SIMMONS:

Senator SIMMONS. Some of these lands have never grown any timber at all, I understand.

Mr. PINCHOT. None of the lands that I know of. All of these lands have grown timber that I am speaking of.

He then goes on to say that the only areas within the forest-reserve limits that are without timber are not essentially timber lands, but are such as are above the timber line on the mountains.

Mr. HEYBURN. We have none such in Idaho.

Mr. DOLLIVER. So that, while I do not complain of the Senator's statement, I think I ought, on behalf of the Forestry Service, to say that no such state of facts is admitted by the bureau at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it has been admitted always heretofore, and, in any event, it is an absolute fact. There are at least 9,000,000 acres of forest reserves in the State of Idaho that have not a tree upon them.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Have the trees been cut off?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; they have never had trees upon them within the recollection or knowledge of man.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand, Mr. President, that there are some lands in Idaho in forest reserves that have not trees upon them at the present time, but they are lands within little valleys on both sides of which are forests of trees, and that land can be taken up to-day under the same law and in the same way as any other land belonging to the public domain.

Mr. HEYBURN. Just let me answer right here, before that is confused with other statements. The areas of which I speak are areas outside of the timber sections and are not composed of the valleys to which the Senator refers. They are areas that lie right out in the plains.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, they are lands that are withdrawn for the purpose of protecting the watersheds of streams.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no provision in the act of Congress authorizing the withdrawal of any lands for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. The very provision the Senator read a few moments ago contained that authority—the provision in regard to securing favorable conditions of water flows.

Mr. HEYBURN. It says "For the purpose of securing favorable conditions of water flows"——

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly the condition applying to those lands in Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. "And to furnish a continuous supply of timber." If any intelligent man, with full knowledge of the facts, were to go on the ground to which I refer, and then give that as an excuse, he would be laughed out of the country. If the Senator could see those vast areas—and when you talk about 9,000,000 acres of land you are talking about a pretty big tract of land—and then give as an excuse for withdrawing them that they are to protect the watersheds, he would not be willing even to defend his own statement.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I only want to say further in relation to the matter, that I know that is the position taken by the Forestry Service, and I know that in some parts of Idaho, where I have personally visited, that is the case. As to the 9,000,000 acres, I can not say, because I have not been all over the State of Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; and I suppose the Senator probably would be edified by seeing an accurate map.

Mr. SMOOT. I have seen the map.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; the Senator has never seen this map [exhibiting] or any one like it. It has just been made.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I wish to substantiate the statement of the Senator from Idaho, so far as Colorado is concerned.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, this map [exhibiting] is so presented that he who runs may read. This [indicating] is the State of Idaho, as it is chopped to pieces by the forest reserves. Those white areas there [indicating] are forest reserves. They isolate and detach great areas of that State, so that if you go from one of those detached areas to another you are a trespasser upon the forest reserve.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator——

Mr. HEYBURN. That represents 20,000,000 acres of land carved out of that State. Let it be in the RECORD that the State of Idaho is 5,000 square miles larger than all of the New England States combined.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to say, so that Senators will really know, that the white part on the map the Senator shows as being in the forest reserves is not agricultural land. It is made up of mountain ranges from almost one end of the State to the other.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, we have the evidence of a Senator who has seen, perhaps, these little isolated white tracts down in the southeastern corner of the State. I happen to have lived for more than a quarter of century within this vast area of forest reserves that covers the richest part of the State, and I know something about it.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not been from one end to the other of the Senator's State, but I do know there is a range of mountains running along that part of the map indicated in white.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, a few years ago we had in Idaho what we called an "immigration convention," for the purpose of setting forth the advantages and the possibilities of that State to those who might desire to come there. The best exhibit of fruits in that convention—and it was a great exhibit—came from what are now forest reserves; the best barnyards and the best orchards that I know of in the State of Idaho are right on the line of a forest reserve. Nature has not burned the ground on one side of that line. I have ridden and driven for days through what are now forest reserves in Idaho, with the white clover and the timothy, native grasses in that country, above the knees of the horses. There is enough natural pasturage in Idaho in those forest reserves to maintain 15,000,000 head of animals.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, does the Senator mean to say——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean to say that there is feed going to waste in the forest reserves?

Mr. HEYBURN. The question whether it goes to waste does not occur to me as being very important. The principle upon which the devotees of the Forestry Service seem to act is, that when the water once flows over the dam of a rock it is gone forever, and no more comes; that when the grass dies at the end of the season, it will never come again, and unless it is eaten up during that season, that is the end of it; that when a tree is cut, that is the end of the forest. This process of growth and waste has been going on in the world from the beginning. The fact that water is flowing without being used seems to be accepted by these enthusiastic conservators of the public resources as though it were an actual waste. They go clear out to Idaho to find some burning example to hold up and inspire the horror of people who are not well acquainted with the situation. I can stand at the White House or on the steps of the Capitol and point up to the falls of the Potomac, where power has been wasted under that rule from the beginning, and yet there is as much power there to-day as there was at the beginning. Still they call that a waste of the natural resources of the country.

I know vast forests to-day—I will say in Idaho, but I know them elsewhere—that have been burned over within my recollection and have regrown and reproduced merchantable timber. The process of burning is one of nature's house-cleaning processes. I know forests to-day that would be benefited by being burned over. Take the ride 80 miles from Stites into the Bitter Root Forest Reserve, this great reserve here. If that forest had been burned over twenty or thirty years ago, to-day it would be a valuable timber tract. As it is, I went there once when the wind was blowing, and we were in danger all the time from dead, rotten trees blowing down upon us, because the forest had not ever been used and it has not yet been used, but the rotten trees and the dead trees are being preserved there under the impression that they are doing some good to this or some other generation.

The greatest good you could do the people would be to convert those lands into homes, and let people live on them. I would rather have an orchard of Idaho apples or peaches or pears on a tract of land than any timber, because you can buy a substitute for timber; the other sustains life.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think any advocate of the Forestry Service disagrees with the Senator in relation to the value of an orchard. But if there is any place in a forest reserve in the State of Idaho where you can raise apples, or which is fit for agricultural purposes, homesteaders can go in and locate upon it.

Another thing: The Senator spoke of the waste of grasses and clover that are growing there. I do not believe there is a single solitary section in all the forests of Idaho that is not eaten clean every year, because there are thousands of men making applications all the time for permits to go upon those reserves.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am astonished that the Senator should make a statement like that. The little corner of Idaho that he has seen is about as big, compared with the State, as one of these desks compared with the Hall.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, well; that is all right.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator talks about the land being eaten bare. There is not a sheep to speak of north of the Salmon River. The great part of Idaho where its chief wealth lies, in the center and north of Idaho, is not pastured by any animals.

Mr. SMOOT. All I know is that if there is any complaint at all in relation to all of the forest reserves of this country, not only in Idaho, but in every State, it is that they are overfed and not underfed; and that is the case in Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. The difficulty is, if they are overfed they are overfed by the wrong people.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, well, of course the wrong people; but the record shows that there are ten using the reserves to-day where there was one about five years ago.

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope before I tire the Senate I will come to that question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator made a statement a moment ago which I am sure, on its being called to his attention, he will correct, and that was the description of a forest through which if a man passed he was in danger from rotten trees that were neglected and lying on the ground. The Senator knows, of course, that under the present administration of the Forestry Service that is one of the things that is prevented; that is to say, what is known as "ripe timber" is cut and sold instead of falling and going to waste. That is one of the purposes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator would like to be put right——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; if I am wrong.

Mr. HEYBURN. In the statement he makes about the timber being cut and sold.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not think the Senator wants to have it stand in the RECORD that fires are admirable things for forest lands.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I do not; but some newspaper scribbler will say so. They generally pick out an isolated sentence, or a half a sentence, if necessary, in order to distort the discussion of this question, but I do not intend that the official record of this body shall say so.

Mr. BEVERIDGE rose.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, I want to answer the other proposition of the Senator.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. As a matter of fact, I distinctly heard the Senator from Idaho. I listened with great interest to him, as we always do, for he makes his statements very clear; and he pointed out a forest in Idaho and said it would have been an admirable thing for that forest if it could have been burned by fire.

Mr. HEYBURN. Twenty years ago.

Mr. SMOOT. Thirty years ago.

Mr. HEYBURN. Thirty will do as well as twenty.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Do I understand the Senator to say that a fire would have been good for a forest thirty years ago, but not now?

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator could realize how far he is from the real kernel of that proposition, he would be astonished.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am just as far as the Senator is, for I was following the Senator's statement.

Mr. HEYBURN. When the Senator speaks of it being the policy of the Government to cut the ripe timber and sell it, he is further off still. You could no more cut and haul lumber to any market from the Bitter Root Forest Reserve, which is as big as some States I know of, than you could make profit out of hauling meat in a wagon from here to New York—not at all. It is absolutely outside of any possible market. There is Elk City, a mining camp——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then, if that is true, if that is the unfortunate location of this forest, what is the harm of having it in a forest reserve?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will answer that, and I will do it to the satisfaction of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator can further answer this: If that is true, then why do men whose business it is to cut trees and make them into lumber want to get at this very forest reserve? And a third question, all of which he can answer at the same time, is this: If the forest is so unhappily situated, then what good would it do to throw it open to settlement in the way the Senator indicates, because the settlers would have to cut off the vast forests, and they would not have any place to which to take the product?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is just such questions as those which make the people who know about it gasp.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator is asking four questions. I will forget those questions if other matter intervenes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was just going to say that it takes something more than a gasp to answer the question.

Mr. HEYBURN. We will see now. There is a tract of land known as the "Bitter Root Forest Reserve." It is on the edge of that forest reserve that the wheat fields and the orchards and the homes——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I am going to finish the answer before I yield, because I will forget the questions if I do not. It is on the edge of that reserve that these conditions exist. At the time the forest reserve was created we had just made a large appropriation for the purpose of building a state wagon road through that reservation, so that immigration might go there, and settlers might come in and make their homes. We had no more than made that appropriation and started to build the road than the Government set the land aside as a forest reserve, whereupon the possibility of and the inducement for settlement ceased. It may be said that a man can locate agricultural land in a forest reserve, but when you make the conditions onerous and the terms upon which he can do it humiliating——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I am going to answer the questions before I submit to an interruption. I must insist upon answering these questions, otherwise some enterprising reporter will say I failed to answer.

Mr. President, to learn what would have happened or what conditions would have existed had the forest reserve not been there, we have only to compare it with the adjoining country. Land does not lose its fertility or its possibility for cultivation according to a straight and arbitrary line, so that on one side of the land a man may make a living and on the other starve to death. Inside the forest reserve is the town of Elk City, which is one of the prosperous mining camps in the country, and when those people go in and out they go by permission of the rules and regulations of the Forestry Service.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to get these three questions answered. I have had some experience recently with interruptions. Had the forest reserve not been created, the men who have those orchards and wheat fields and vineyards there would have had neighbors by the score. As it is now, the neighbors are all on one side—the side away from the reservation. Towns other than mining towns are there. There are a number of public schools and churches that have been there, some of them, since 1864 and 1865, and yet they ruthlessly included them in this great big coil which they have thrown around that country. They changed their condition from that of a people who had a possibility of community life around them to an assured condition of isolation forever, because I am told every few days that this policy has come to stay. That is one of the favorite expressions indulged in to terrify those of us who are determined that it shall not stay. The people are beginning to learn something in regard to these matters. They are beginning to distinguish between the sacred character of a law and somebody's policy. This is a Government based upon law and not upon the policy of any man or set of men; and when they say to me as they say, and say it in the papers, that the policy of the forest reserves has come to stay, I say maybe it has, but the law will step in and protect the people against its ravages and its oppressions.

That great country would have been filled with settlers had not the forest reserve been there as it has been for fifteen, aye, seventeen years nearly. That answers the first and second questions of the Senator from Indiana as to why these conditions exist to-day. They exist because the blight of the Forestry Service has been upon them, and the expenditure of the States in building that great north and south road has been thrown away, because there is no longer the inducement to travel over it, except to the few places that were there and were marooned when the forest reserve encompassed them.

That is why the expenditure of the State has been wasted, and it has been made waste by the Government, whose first and highest duty to a State is to protect it against just that kind of thing.

What was the third question? My memory is fairly good, but sometimes it is not sufficiently good to carry three questions in my mind and undertake to answer them.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The third question, Mr. President, I think the Senator has confused with the first and second. But I will state it again. It was this: In view of the unhappy location, as he states it, of the forest, and the fact that it is so far away from a market that if the timber were cut it would not do any good, conceding that to be true, how could he expect settlers to go in and cut down the timber with which they could not do anything, and build homes there?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Wait a moment. Now, the Senator after that raised here another question most engaging. He says that right in the midst of this forest reserve, which he has pictured as being a desolation, there is a thriving city.

Mr. HEYBURN. A half dozen of them.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. A half dozen. So it is a half dozen times stronger than I thought. Very clearly then the forest reserves can not be such a despotism to industry as the Senator indicates, if in the very midst of them there are a half dozen thriving cities.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suppose the Senator from Indiana does not recollect it, but Elk City produced and added to the volume of the gold of the United States more than $10,000,000, which was taken right out of the ground; and Pierce City——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The forest reserve did not prevent that.

Mr. HEYBURN. This was before the men who have gone crazy on the forest-reserve question were born. The mining industry in that section to-day is one of the most prosperous in the country, and they are and have been erecting enormous mills there for the purpose of working the ores that are developed, and developed by that evolution process of mining where there is always something beyond the point of the pick, and one does not know what it is until it is discovered.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then, in view of the exceeding prosperity of all these cities within the midst of these forest reserves, what is the row about?

Mr. HEYBURN. There would be other cities and other farms and other settlements and stores and industries there. These cities do not occupy all the desirable or available territory within the reserve.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then the objection of the Senator is not to the prosperous cities that do exist in the midst of the forest reserve, but to the prosperous cities that might exist there.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will give you some information from Idaho County, Idaho. I will take the liberty of reading for just a statement:

> The hardship to the State and the manner in which its progress is impeded by forest reserves is strongly illustrated by the facts set forth in a joint memorial presented by Parsons, of Idaho County, to the house of representatives yesterday, addressed to the Congress of the United States, for relief by the building of a highway across land that the Government has seen fit to exercise jurisdiction over, but which it has not seen fit to expend money upon by way of improvement, and which it has not seen fit to exercise police jurisdiction over.
> It is frequently stated that Idaho County is a very large county, and it is common to compare its area with various States of the East. But according to the figures given in the memorial, the county consists of but 911,165 acres of land, while the forest reserve takes from the county the immense total of 5,036,480 acres.

There is the proportion of the ownership of the Government of the United States in Idaho County and of the citizenship of the county; and I may say, with absolute assurance from personal knowledge of it of many years' extent, that every part of that county would be inhabited if it were not for the forest reserve. They brought the forest reserve right up to the line of the then settlement; and if they had waited another year they would have been miles short of where they are now, and another one and another one, and the whole county would have been settled up. The climate of that county is comparable with the climate in the State of New York, and the soil is incomparable. It will grow anything you put in it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I notice that one of the complaints made by the memorial is that the Government exercises an inadequate police control and supervision of the reservation, and that it fails in the expenditure of a proper amount of money for the improvement of the reserve.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; and that will be more apparent to the Senator as I read on.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. If Idaho County has such land and such a climate, and if it can raise any kind of product, why do not people settle there now, because even if it is in a forest reserve they can go and locate and make homes there just the same as if it were without a reserve?

Mr. HEYBURN. Only last year they drove out of there a family that had been living there until their children, who had been born there, were half grown; and they drove them out on technicalities. I produced the correspondence a year ago in discussing the then pending matter.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN, Now, let me proceed.

Mr. SMOOT. I remember the very case——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but not for extended discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to proceed.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator knows that my only object in protesting against too much interruption is that my remarks may not appear in the RECORD divided up.

Mr. SMOOT. The only reason I wanted to explain the case the Senator had reference to was because I remember well that he did make that charge in the very case to which he now calls the attention of the Senate, and the facts in the matter were absolutely different from what had been reported to the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. I happen to know the people; I have been at their place; I have known them for years; and I do not have to go to anybody's record to know about those people and their settlement and the character of it.

Mr. SMOOT. We had here the testimony from the people themselves, besides a letter from a man stating that the case was entirely different from what it was here represented to be.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not going to try that case again. I intend to proceed with this matter. I want these facts—they are authentic—put before the Senate. I had just stated the number of acres in the forest reserve—911,165 not in the forest reserve, 5,036,480 in the forest reserve:

> That is to say, the Government exercises authority for the purpose of withdrawing from settlement, development, and the enrichment of that county nearly six times as much as is left to the county.
> This county, instead of being made rich by the immense wealth within the boundary lines of the county fixed by the State, is impoverished thereby, for, as the memorial suggests, "said county of Idaho is compelled to exercise police power and maintain criminal jurisdiction over the immense national forest reserve of 5,036,480 acres, being larger in extent than the combined States of Rhode Island, Delaware, and Connecticut"—

That is one county—

> "and the only revenue the said Idaho County receives from the forest reserve department is 10 per cent of the rentals of said reserve lands, which is not sufficient to cover the cost of a single criminal case originating in the above-mentioned reserves."—

It is 25 per cent this last year, but it was 10 per cent when this article was written—

> Elsewhere in the memorial it is related that the entire rentals of that reserve for 1906, the last report obtainable, amounted to but $1,729.90—

That was the income from the reserve—

> When it is remembered that the county gets but a tenth of that, it may be seen how small a recompense is made to the State for its loss in resources, together with its burdens of maintaining law and order upon land the Government selfishly withholds from public use.
>
> But this is not all, as narrated by the memorial. Within the boundaries of that forest reserve are not less than 25 mining camps and 20 stamp mills of from 2 to 30 stamp capacity each.
>
> Those who have kept in touch with the discussion of the rules and restrictions imposed by the Forestry Department against mineral explorations and the restrictions against obtaining patent to mining claims can readily understand what a hardship to the mining industry of that section this is.
>
> The purpose of the memorialists is to induce Congress to build a wagon road from Grangeville that will bring a large number of these flourishing camps into easy communication with a railway. For that purpose $75,000 is asked—

The railway is at Grangeville—

> The memorial states facts sufficient to warrant Congress in acting, but it is safe to say right now that any such appropriation will have the united opposition of the powerful Forestry Department, and if Congress acts it will be because the Members of that body have already learned to distrust the Forestry Bureau. The fact that the mining camps produced as much as $119,389.91, mostly in gold, during the first eleven months of last year is a sufficient guaranty that Pinchot and his forces will not wish any further encouragement added to the mining industry of Idaho County.

That is a very fair statement of conditions in Idaho County. Do they not appeal to Senators? If it was the State that sent you to this body, would you not think there was food for thought in that statement by the responsible organization of that county? I could go on and tell you that the expenses of trying criminal cases that originated within the forest reserve amount to thousands of dollars in that county. The roads that are there were built by the State. The road from Stites in through to Elk City and Buffalo Peak and the mining camps adjoining were built by the State, and yet the State has only a privilege in there. What objection can there be to trading off that solitude that lies between and surrounds these settlements? Do you think that the condition that has existed there so long that the trees sway in their rotting age and fall across the highway is desirable, more desirable than citizenship that would live and vote and pay taxes and contribute to the wealth of the country and build up civilization there? There are some 35 public schools within the forest reserves in Idaho, or were the last time I took the census.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is not so bad.

Mr. HEYBURN. Those were built by the people who were there when the forest reserves were created. There is no inducement to go in there now. All this talk about being able to get homesteads in a forest reserve is the idlest folly. While it looks plausible that upon making certain applications and proofs you can get them, yet the number of homes that are allowed is so small as not to be worthy of consideration.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The record would seem to indicate that 4,000 settlers were given homestead rights in forest reserves.

Mr. HEYBURN. What reserves?

Mr. DOLLIVER. All of them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; all in the United States.

Mr. DOLLIVER. And a part of the extra expenditure which the Bureau of Forestry is to be at during the coming fiscal year arises from the fact that the bureau expects and hopes to be able greatly to multiply the issue of permits for homestead entries within the reservations.

Mr. HEYBURN. Four or five thousand homesteaders upon 200,000,000 acres of land. They would be so far apart that they would not be within rifle range of each other.

Mr. WARREN. Of course the Senator from Idaho does not mean to say there are 200,000,000 acres of land in forest reserves.

Mr. HEYBURN. In the United States?

Mr. WARREN. In the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. How many are there?

Mr. WARREN. About 160,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. One hundred and sixty-seven million.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have not kept track of the making of forest reserves in those States which are so fond of them that they allow them to be made by executive order, but I will say a hundred and sixty million acres, if you please, or even if it was a hundred million acres; what are four or five thousand people on a hundred million acres of land? I know from observation that this talk of allowing men to take homesteads in forest reservations is an absolute fraud. What inducement is there?

Suppose a man knows of a desirable tract of land in some valley in a forest reserve. Is he going in there and exhaust his rights to take a homestead without any assurance of schools, churches, and the things that make life civilized? Hardly. The fact is that with rare exceptions they avoid the forest reserves and the forestry conditions.

New conditions have been forced upon that part of the country that were unknown to this country before. There is a new class of uniformed civilians. What chapter in the laws of this country ever contemplated uniformed civilians of the Government of the United States, men with sage-green uniforms on and hats with a turned-up brim, with a cock's feather, to indicate that they represented the Government of the United States?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Who ever heard of that condition until these foreign ideas were brought in and forced upon us?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I had something to do with the framing of the provision under which homesteads were permitted in forest reservations. I think all Senators will agree that that act does not give the right to anyone to enter a forest reservation to select a home. The Forestry Service must first make a finding to the effect that certain land is suitable for homestead settlement. This is not left to the judgment of the home seeker.

I sympathize with the position of the Senator from Idaho in criticising the policy of the Forestry Service in the execution of this law. It has not only been made difficult for persons to go and take lands within the forest reserves where the land is notoriously agricultural and of no value for timber purposes, and the new men have not only been kept out, but settlers, whose children have been born and buried within sight of their homes in the forest reserves, have been driven by a systematic persecution out of their homes and beyond the limits of the reserves.

I have one case in mind. A man west of the town of Anaconda, in Montana, whose improvements had cost over $10,000 had a handsome meadow in front of the house. There was not a tree growing in it. The place had been occupied for twenty-odd years. It was the home of the family. Yet a forest ranger directed that man to leave in the autumn after his crop has been harvested and the haystack stood there ready to feed his cattle through the winter. He refused to go. He said his all was at stake.

Complaint was made to the district attorney upon a statement of facts, that did not finally pan out with the real facts, which caused this man to be indicted. He had nought to do but to plead guilty, because he was there upon the forest reserve without a permit. The district attorney appealed to the forest ranger after the man had pleaded guilty to permit him to remain until spring. But the forest ranger said:

> Our authority must first be established. This man must leave this place with his family, and when he is outside of the forest reserve we will consider whether we will let him back or not.

This is not an isolated case. The harshness and cruelty and inhumanity of the administration are notorious through the States where these petty tyrants have exercised their brief and fleeting authority.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator before he sits down what was the final outcome? What is the condition now respecting that settler?

Mr. CARTER. The district attorney told me he had reported the facts to the Department of Justice, and hoped that the department would appeal to the department in Washington. I have not been advised of the result.

Mr. WARREN. We may assume, then, that the man is still there.

Mr. CARTER. If the forest-reserve agent could put him off he was put out on the approach of winter.

Mr. WARREN. I wanted to know only the fact, if he is still there.

Mr. CARTER. I am not aware of the fact as to that.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the name of the man, if the Senator can give it to me.

Mr. CARTER. The name I do not recall. The case is well known undoubtedly in the Department of Justice and the Forest Reserve Service. It was in the county of Deer Lodge, west of Anaconda, an old-established homestead place. The indictment was found in the district of Montana during the autumn term of the circuit court of appeals. The man pleaded guilty and was fined $50 as a trespasser on a forest reservation. I can secure the name, of course, from the Department of Justice tomorrow by finding the letter of the district attorney.

Mr. SMOOT. The only object I had is that I wished to look up the case, and I thought perhaps the Senator could give the name.

Mr. CARTER. That, of course, is one case. I regret to say that I could recapitulate cases not quite as bad as this one, because the amount of improvements was great here; but I could recapitulate cases that have come to my notice in the State of Montana until the hour of midnight approached. The one thing about this matter that deserves special censure is that when a complaint is made to the Chief Forester at Washington, that complaint is referred back for report to the agent complained of, and his word is accepted.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator except for the purpose of saying that neither the Forestry Bureau nor the Department of Agriculture has any toleration for such outrages and acts of injustice as Senators complain of here. The committee has taken pains to take some little testimony as to the present relations of the Forestry Service toward the people immediately in the neighborhood of these reservations. The testimony indicated to the committee that these complaints had been heard by the department, that improved methods were constantly being initiated, and that to-day the best friends the Forestry Service have in the region where these great reservations exist are the homestead settlers on the reservations.

A part of the request made by the Forester of the committee was more money to enable the bureau to make the necessary preliminary examination to still further enlarge the opportunities of homestead settlement within these reservations. The testimony also tended to indicate that there are only about two unsatisfied parties near the forest reservations.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. DOLLIVER. One of them is the great shepherds of sheep, and the other the enterprising gentlemen sometimes organized into corporate form, who want to embody these reserves with a view to appropriating the timber by wholesale.

I believe myself, from a somewhat careful travel over the various reservation territories, talking with numerous people of all sorts and conditions, that the friction which has so often disturbed the peace and harmony of the Senate by the descriptions of outrages and injustice, instead of being still in force has been reduced to the minimum, and that if we can make a final settlement with the great sheep people and the gentlemen who desire to cut timber on a wholesale scale, the policy of the Forest Reserve Service will be harmoniously accepted by the rest of the community, even in States like Montana.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, that kind of an answer to specific cases is ancient and threadbare, and I am astonished that the Senator from Iowa will indulge in it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. It is hardly less threadbare than these cases have become in the Senate.

Mr. CARTER. I am amazed that the Senator from Iowa, orator and logician as he is, a man of distinguished capacity for analysis, should undertake to answer specific cases by appealing to the old, threadbare argument that some wealthy person is about to invade these forest reserves, and therefore the complaints are made.

Mr. President, let me cite the case of a man who is not a timber baron nor a sheep herder. Oscar Sparta lived for twenty-odd years near the town of Haskell, in a forest reserve in Montana. Passing by that place, I saw a little oasis in the midst of a small valley which we approached. There were 20 acres fenced in. It was a beautiful fence, with the best mortising and the plank dovetailed in. It stood erect. The stone had been picked up in the middle of the little field and piled with that industry that characterizes the New England farmer. A house was in the course of construction at the upper end of the little place. The man who was driving the livery rig in which I was traveling said that used to be the home of Oscar Sparta. I had known of Oscar Sparta for many years, though I had never met him, and I have not met him since.

Oscar Sparta was a mining prospector. This was his own home. He had lived there over twenty years. He lived in a small cabin outside, and was building a new log house at odd times. He had been building it for many years, and he was building a stable farther up. This man told me that Oscar Sparta paid $25 to a man to haul up fertilizer from the village, 5 or 6 miles down the mountain, to fertilize the little garden just back of the house.

That was the situation when the property was put into a forest reserve. The forestry supervisor concluded that Oscar Sparta's home, that beautiful little oasis in the mountain, without a tree upon it or a merchantable bit of timber within 10 miles of it, was a good place for his forest reserve man's headquarters. He ordered Oscar Sparta off the place, put him out on the mountain side, and told him if he complained he would have him arrested. The poor man went away, and the day I passed by the forest ranger's horses were in Oscar Sparta's field, eating the timothy hay.

I complained of that to the forest reservation people at Washington. They sent the complaint made back to the local fellow, and what was the reply? That Oscar Sparta was a shiftless fellow, in the habit of going down to Townsend, the county seat near by, and getting drunk periodically, and he was put off in consequence, and he had no right in the premises. That man is a wanderer on the hillside to-day, with the forest reserve agent living in his home, because the Government paid for the lumber to finish Oscar Sparta's house. It is a beautiful spot in the mountain, a very proper place to build a home for the forest supervisor, but they ought not to do it.

Let me tell the Senator from Iowa that I can to-day go into the department records down here and upon the face of the protests against the homestead filings I can find these entries: "Rush this along"—that is, the cancellation of a man's homestead—"we want this place for a headquarters." This instruction is given to the man who is to impartially investigate between the citizen and the Government, and in plain letters upon the face of it there is the direction to the impartial court to rush it along, because the man's place was wanted for a headquarters.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. CARTER. I will not go into these matters at greater length now.

Mr. BURROWS. I wish to ask a question. How did this beautiful home which the Senator from Montana has described get into a reservation; by what authority?

Mr. CARTER. It was put there by executive order.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask one question. This Oscar Sparta located upon this land, built this beautiful home and this beautiful fence, spent all this money, and got the fertilizer from down the valley to put upon the land, and had not made any entry of the land?

Mr. CARTER. It was unsurveyed land, and he could not make an entry.

Mr. SMOOT. Then he was there and spent all that money, knowing full well that he had no title whatever.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah knows that the squatter's right is a sacred right all over the public domain of the United States, and even in making grants of land we except the individual who has his home, even though no filing can be made until a survey is projected. The Senator knows this man was justified by a practice a century old in going upon the unoccupied public domain and building his home there.

There is another peculiarity, Mr. President, in the Oscar Sparta case. Strange as it may seem, the poor man's effects were thrown out of his place. He wandered away and the house in which he had been living for twenty years happened to burn down just a few days afterwards. So he could not live inside the fence; he could not live outside the fence. I do not know where he lives, but that is not fair treatment to a citizen of the country. That kind of treatment will breed anarchists, if it is in the blood of any man to resist injustice.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the junior Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. On account of a great many complaints in my State, on January 25 I introduced a resolution for the purpose of having the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry investigate these complaints. I have been informed now for a long time that no action has been taken in regard to the resolution, although the resolution had been referred to the Secretary of Agriculture. I presume the Secretary of Agriculture has not been desirous of having the Forestry Service investigated.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I want to just read one order that comes from the Chief Forester himself as a sample of the manner in which they wreak vengeance upon those who do not yield readily to their wishes. Here is an order signed by the Chief Forester himself:

> Therefore persons who allow their stock to drift and cross the various reservations without a permit, whether they do so intentionally or otherwise, will be regarded as trespassers.

That might do if it stopped there, but it goes on:

> And will lose all right to permitted privileges of any kind upon forest reserves.

If a man were to permit his stock that he turned out every night from his emigrant wagon in which he was hauling his family across the forest reserve to stray, and they should eat the grass that grew, and if afterwards he were to apply to enter a homestead under the law he would read there:

> No; you allowed your stock to drift away from your camp and eat the grass of the Government.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the junior Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to suggest to my colleague that the Forester is given a power there which would not rest in a court. If a court were to render a judgment against a man, it could only render the judgment; it could not enter a decree that never again should that citizen have the right to exercise his privilege upon the public domain.

Mr. HEYBURN. This disfranchises him, all right. A Senator suggested that this kind of law and this character of administration of the law breeds anarchists. This forestry policy, as it is called, which they say has come to stay, is breeding anarchists. It is making men hate their Government, because of the injustice that is wrought them through the uniformed agents of the Government.

Mr. President, something was said about timber barons wanting to invade these lands. Do not Senators know that the whole policy of forest reserves was concocted in the back office of timber barons? Do not Senators know that the large timber syndicates of this country are responsible for the conception of this idea? When the forest reserves were created in Idaho, withdrawing from all possibility of competition, say 12,000,000 acres of the finest white pine timber in the world, it added $45,000,000 to the value of the private holdings of one concern in the State of Idaho. If they could be permitted to close the opportunity to produce lumber against every other man, do I need to elaborate the effect it would have upon those who had already secured their rights?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I want just to finish this statement; I do not want it broken into.

There are in the county in which I live 300,000 acres of that class of holdings, obtained somehow before the door was closed against others. The law can not affect them; they are there, and the chief owner of these lands is one of the vice-presidents of the National Forestry Service. The president of it is our distinguished Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I must finish this statement. I can not be broken into here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho declines to yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. I can not have what I am about to say cut apart from what I have just said. The Secretary of Agriculture is a man for whom I have the highest regard personally. He is an honest man in his intentions and in his acts, but, like many men of splendid character, he is the victim of men shrewder than himself. I have on every occasion when I have spoken on this question called attention to the fact that the whole plan was laid in a conspiracy to monopolize the lumber market of the United States; and they have succeeded in doing it.

Mr. President, we have new conditions existing because of this policy, forsooth, that never were contemplated or dreamed of until the grasping greed of this lumber syndicate conceived the idea of shutting up the possibilities of competition and putting the lock of the Government of the United States upon them, so that the citizen who did not belong to the syndicate was barred out.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FLINT. I should like to ask the Senator whether he thinks it would be better to have this timber acquired by these lumber companies as they acquired it in the past, or whether it would be better to have the land retained by the Government?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, with all due respect to the Senator from California, whom I esteem very highly, that reminds me of the question, "Why is a Populist?" There is no argument in that kind of a question; we are dealing with facts.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I have not quite gotten my breath yet.

Mr. FLINT. I did not quite catch the Senator's answer. I have made some investigations. I will say that 90 per cent of the holdings of timber land that are the property of these great companies were fraudulently acquired, with a knowledge in many cases of the men who now hold them; and, in my opinion, it is much wiser for the Government to continue its present policy of holding such lands in forest reserves and to carry out a policy under which these lands can not be fraudulently acquired by these corporations.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suppose that we would live in mud huts in the meantime in this generation.

Mr. BORAH. I ask the Senator from California where he gets his figures upon that proposition?

Mr. FLINT. From the fact that many suits have been filed by the Government of the United States to recover these lands, many of them being decided against the Government on the statute of limitations and others on some mere technicality. It is generally known throughout the West—not only in California, but in all the Western States—that there is not one of these great timber companies that would be able to stand an invesigation as to whether or not their lands were fraudulently acquired. An investigation of the records of the Land Department will show this; and anyone who desires to familiarize himself with the situation, with the fraudulent character of the holdings of these great corporations, can do so by going to the Interior Department and asking for the reports of the special agents in reference to these lands.

Mr. BORAH. I am not going to enter upon the defense of anyone who has acquired lands fraudulently. I only want to say, in behalf of the settlers of the West, that, if the Senator from California will make a thorough investigation, he will find that, instead of 90 per cent, less than 10 per cent of the public lands which have been acquired have been acquired even in a questionable way; and that the great body of men who have settled in the West have settled honestly and in accordance with the laws of the land.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to ask the Senator from Idaho this question: If the forest reserves had not been created, would not these same timber barons, of whom he speaks, have extended their holdings, and, instead of holding 300,000 acres of land in Idaho, would they not perhaps have held 3,000,000 of acres by this time? I would like the Senator to answer that question.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have often regretted that I was not a prophet; but, unfortunately I am not, and so I do not know what might have happened.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply asked the Senator to give his opinion. He certainly has an opinion on it.

Mr. HEYBURN. A legal opinion, a medical opinion, or a scientific opinion? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. Just exactly the opinion the Senator would like to give.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no opinion on the subject.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, that is an answer.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have opinions on some subjects, though, which are of more importance in the consideration of this question than that.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. I simply want to answer the statement made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. He attempted to answer my charge that timber lands in the West had been fraudulently acquired, and then he started into a discussion of the entire public-land laws under which public lands have been acquired. I am not making any criticism of the homesteader who has honestly endeavored to acquire a home, but I say that no Senator here who will investigate the matter in the Interior Department or obtain the facts as to the holdings of these great timber companies will fail to discover that 90 per cent of the holdings of these great corporations have been fraudulently acquired.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know how it is in California, and the statement, from what I have heard of that region of the country, may be entirely true; but I do want to say that, so far as the State of Idaho is concerned—which has been so libeled and slandered in such matters—less than 10 per cent of the land which has been acquired has not been acquired even in a questionable way, and that the great body of land that has been acquired there has been acquired by honest settlers. The corporations can not acquire lands except through the settlers. In regard to our lands, which we are now speaking of, less than 10 per cent of the land which has been acquired has been acquired in the way suggested by the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT].

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, the records of the Interior Department will not bear out the statement of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that of the lands now in the ownership of these great corporations in the State of Idaho less than 10 per cent have been fraudulently acquired.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator from California is speaking with reference to broad charges based upon no facts, then I submit he is correct; but when you eliminate from the charges those as to which no facts are found to sustain them, you will find that my statement is correct. It is very easy to say that a million acres of land have been acquired fraudulently and to place the charge upon the books to that effect, but when they have adduced the proof and submitted evidence, they have found that less than 2 per cent of the charges which they have made have been sustained.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, because, forsooth, bad men may exist and attempt to wrong or succeed in wronging the Government is no reason why injustice should be wreaked upon good men. I am speaking for the good citizenship of the United States and of our western country. That the good citizenship should be deprived of their rights because some other men have violated the law is an intolerable conclusion. It will not do. Ninety-nine per cent, aye more than that, of the men who are on the land to-day are there in compliance with the law which gave them the right to go there. Would you shut off this generation from benefiting in the public resources, lands and otherwise, of the country merely because frauds are committed? It is a confession of the inadequacy of our Government. Are we not capable of exercising the functions of government that are intrusted to us here in this Hall or in the executive branch of the Government? Does the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT] mean to indict the executive branch of the Government for inability to perform its duties or for willfully permitting frauds to be perpetrated in violation of the law that they are bound to execute and protect?

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. I would say that I never have been able to quite understand why the Congress of the United States has not repealed the law when it is known that the great part of the land acquired under that law was fraudulently obtained, as shown by the reports of the government agents.

Mr. HEYBURN. What law?

Mr. FLINT. The timber and stone act.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the timber and stone act is an act of Congress. It made it very easy for the citizen to get public land that had timber and stone on it and has been valuable for nothing else. I want to challenge the statement which the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT] has made. No considerable portion of that land, so far as my observation goes, has ever been obtained contrary to law. All you had to prove under that law was that the land was more valuable for timber or for stone that it was for agriculture. You had also to prove that you had walked over the land, that you had looked at it, that you knew where it was, that you knew its boundaries, and knew the conditions that brought it within the statute. Then a man could take but a single piece of such land.

Mr. President, it may be that in some of the northwestern sections of the country where very valuable timber grew some people secured for $2.50 an acre what has since become very valuable land; but I want to say that in my section of the country, and in a very large area outside of Colorado, there are probably no fine timber trees. We have pine there, but it is not white pine. We have poor timber. Colorado has no great timber section, and never did have at any time.

There has been some complaint made of the entry of coal land in the State of Colorado, as I recollect, but after pretty nearly fifty years I will venture to say that the Government has never set aside a timber entry in the State of Colorado—not one—and very few coal-land entries, without reference to the statute of limitations, have ever been set aside—not to exceed probably half a dozen during the last fifty years. It is very easy for Senators to get up here and make such statements and make them upon the authority of a lot of perjured scoundrels.

I will recite now, for a moment, what occurred in a neighboring State to mine. There is another Senator here who can bear me out in the truth of the statement or correct me if I make any misstatement. A prosecution was brought in the State of Montana. A certain individual in the employ of the Government secured a large number of indictments—I think 85, or in that neighborhood. I do not mean to say that there were 85 distinct offenses, but he secured, as I recollect, 85 indictments. One of those indictments was tried. That man went on the stand as the star witness of the Government of the United States and swore that in 40 cases he had committed perjury. He gave as a reason why he committed perjury that it was in order to assist somebody else to make title; that he had been paid $30 by each of the parties for making false statements. When they got through with the trial of one of these cases, the district attorney, or the United States attorney, had a transcript made of the evidence and sent it to Washington. If I am not misinformed, the Attorney-General—not the present Attorney-General, but the one who preceded him—after examining the evidence ordered the remainder of those indictments to be quashed and the cases to be dismissed by the Government, saying that the testimony as adduced in that case—which was the strongest case that they had—would not sustain a conviction, if it had been secured.

The worst part of this story I shall now tell. For nearly, if not quite, two years this self-confessed perjurer was employed by the Government of the United States to make examinations and make reports against citizens of that State and other States as to improper methods of securing public lands, the Government paying him, if I am not mistaken, $15 a day when he was out on his crusade and $20 a day when he went into court.

In one of the Western States, in a trial that attracted considerable attention, one of those men went on the stand and swore to a certain state of facts that he had been instructed to swear to, and he said: "I understood that I agreed to swear whatever they wanted me to swear to." That is the class of men, Mr. President, who have been filling up the department records with false statements.

Mr. President, the question is, Do they convict men charged with violating the land laws? The Senator from Montana, in the last Congress, showed here that they convicted practically only 2 or 3 per cent of those who were indicted for making what were claimed to be fraudulent land entries.

I mean to have something further to say on the forest-reserve question before we get through with it, but I wanted to say at this time what I have said in reply to the statement of the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT].

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, in speaking of the question of salaries it may not perhaps be known or have been discovered by Senators that the item in this appropriation bill for salaries is $3,429,292. Of that, $290,360 is for salaries paid in the city of Washington and $3,429,292 for salaries paid outside of the city of Washington. That item last year was $1,982,120. Compare those figures—$3,429,292 this year with $1,982,120 last year. The increase over the fiscal year 1909 for salaries is $1,447,172. For what are they multiplying this service?

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to anticipate the Senator from Montana. I know that they have transferred a certain portion of the salaried officers from Washington to the field, and it was published, with a great deal of boasting, that it would cut down materially the salary item. I will give you the item for Washington as it was before they made the transfer. The salary item in Washington before that time was $337,082. After they made the transfer it was $290,360, a reduction of about $47,000; but the field item increased from $1,982,120 to $3,424,000. in round numbers. That is the way it is growing. We only commenced to make appropriations for the Forestry Service a very few years ago—since I came here—and it has doubled up and doubled up each year, always with the promise that next year the Forest Service would be self-supporting. They are now further from being self-supporting than they have been at any time.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. Did the Senator from Idaho read the appropriation for salaries paid during the last fiscal year or the appropriation for the current fiscal year?

Mr. HEYBURN. So far as the fiscal year goes, the fiscal year is not complete yet. I am reading the figures from the statement of the Forestry Service itself, which is before me.

Mr. DIXON. I want further to ask the Senator from Idaho one or two questions before he proceeds with the debate. I presume every fair-minded man knows that no great system like the forestry system can be inaugurated and put into the field without some local individual hardships having been worked. I am perfectly aware that in individual cases hardships have been worked; but does the Senator from Idaho believe that he makes a fair statement of the operations of the forestry system in the West when he cites these little isolated cases of personal injustice?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; not if that were all. Let me say to the Senator that they were cited merely as a matter of inducement. They are only items. The evil of the forestry system exists in its workings and methods. It has settled down upon one part of the country to the exclusion of every other part of the country, and it has taken possession of the lands and taken possession of the possibilities of the growth of those sections.

Mr. DIXON. Now, will the Senator answer me this question: He criticises the Forestry Service for its failures. What remedy does the Senator from Idaho propose? Would he abolish the great forestry reserve system of the West at this time?

Mr. HEYBURN. I propose the remedies that existed in the beginning; I propose to restore the conditions—and they will be restored, because the country is waking up to the fact that this is a gigantic graft and fraud—to restore the conditions under which American citizens could find American homes upon the public lands of the United States without the consent of any man.

Mr. DIXON. What percentage of the lands in the forest reserves of the West are fitted for agriculture?

Mr. HEYBURN. In our State, all of them.

Mr. DIXON. Then the Senator's State is certainly a bald exception to any other part of the West of which I have knowledge.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is; and I have no hesitation in saying so.

Mr. DIXON. I will make the statement—and I believe I am supported by the facts in the case—that not 1 per cent of the land embraced within the forest reserves is capable of agriculture in its ordinary sense.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. DIXON. Just one moment. I will interrupt the Senator only for a moment. I know there have been isolated cases of injustice, but it is not a square deal to the Forestry Service for Senators from the West to hold up these isolated cases as the type and example of the administration of the Forestry Bureau.

I heard the statement of the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] about a case up in Montana where there were 102 indictments. I was rather familiar with that case. The impression goes out to the country that the Forestry Service were responsible for that. The Forestry Service had no more to do with it than the man in the moon. It was done under orders from the Attorney-General's office eight years ago. It was not connected with the forest reserve.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will pardon me, I will venture to say that it was done by direction of the Land Office through the Attorney-General.

Mr. DIXON. That is right; but that is ancient history. It happened eight or nine or ten years before we knew we had a Forestry Service.

I protest against these individual cases being held up as an example of the way in which the Forest Reserve Service is administered. My experience has been that, as a general proposition, they have tried to be fair in every sense of the word. It is rather remarkable that we hear so much more complaint of the service here than we do at home.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator from Montana if he thinks that we shall ever get rid of these individual hardships so long as the settler is compelled to go not to the universal law of the land to find out how he may take a homestead, but to some individual, who may determine the matter?

Mr. DIXON. I confess, Mr. President, in answer to what the Senator from Idaho says, that there is no question in my mind that the matters of administration can be improved upon, but you must lodge the power somewhere. Of course the rules and regulations of the Forestry Bureau are not perfect. In isolated cases they work hardship, but the whole trend is for a square deal, and we who are not prejudiced in the matter know that to be true.

Mr. TELLER. It is not true.

Mr. BORAH. I presume all of us believe, to some extent, in the preservation of the forests, but we object to that system which prevents a citizen from going to the law to ascertain what his rights are with reference to acquiring a title and compels him to go to an individual. As was so well said by my colleague [Mr. HEYBURN] a few moments ago, this is a government of law and not of men. If you will crystallize these rules and regulations into a statute, so that a citizen may know what he may do and when he does it know that he will be protected, this system will be greatly renovated and corrected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the Senator does not wish to represent things in a different light from what they really are. I want to call his attention to the figures that he gave a moment ago in relation to the salary item. It is true that the amount of $3,429,000 was estimated for by the department for this purpose. If that had been granted, the bill would have carried $5,991,500. But that was cut down until the bill only carries $5,146,200. So the Senator must deduct from the figures he gave over $850,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; Mr. President, I was stating the estimate for the fiscal year, and, of course, it can only be an estimate. I had already stated in the earlier part of my remarks the condition as to the appropriation in the bill itself. It is not necessary to go back over that every time I mention these items.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am calling attention to the very fact that the estimates for this year are $5,991,500.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have the estimates.

Mr. SMOOT. And the appropriation asked for, instead of being $5,991,500, is only $5,146,200, or, in other words, the House did not allow all that was estimated for.

Mr. HEYBURN. I had stated that fact in the beginning of my remarks, for I was reading from the document itself, and I presume I read it accurately. I will not refer to that at this time.

I have been asked by the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] as to whether or not I thought these cases, "isolated" as he termed them, would be a sufficient basis upon which to condemn the Forestry Service. I would unhesitantly say "no" to that, but they simply tend to demonstrate the real spirit and effect of this law, and we must take them into consideration. The crying evil consists in the Government, which, in the absence of forest reserves, is an inhabitant of the State to the extent of its holdings there, coming into the State, disregarding the state laws and the rights of the State, and setting up arbitrarily another government inside of the State, with independent officers of its own, in uniform, attempting to administer a separate set of laws in antagonism to and against the rights of the State.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to develop that idea, and perhaps the Senator will be better satisfied if I finish. That is the summing up of the great evil of this forest-reserve system. The State of Idaho, when admitted to the Union, had a right to count among its assets these lands, because it must look to these lands for its future citizenship, for the taxes that were to maintain its government and to support it. It had a right to expect that these lands would remain open to settlement, that people might come and the State might grow. As it grows in individuals it grows in its wealth. It had a right to expect it. Every other State, prior to the initiation of this scheme, benefited by the public lands. The great States of Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio had lands. They were always open to settlement, and the State was glad to see the settler come, because it meant the payment of taxes, the building of homes, the rearing of families, and all that goes with civilization. There is no such thing as civilization in the absence of men and women and children. Lands do not make civilization; forests do not make or constitute civilization. They were there in the earliest dawn, if there ever was a dawn, and nothing came of them except the silence and solitude of the forest; but when one man came, bringing with him the attributes of citizenship, and when he gathered around him his family, then civilization for the first time had set its foot and its mark upon the country.

Mr. President, when you state, drawing this line around 20,000,000 acres of land in Idaho, that one can go in there no longer by right, no longer by virtue of some law that you have made, but if he would go in there now he may go as a concession and privilege, it is going pretty far. The American people are not fond of that kind of government. It was intended, and it is the spirit of our Government, that every man shall have the same right as another, without asking it as a special privilege and without asking the consent of any person. You have taken away that right, and it is not taken away as to some little township or village or town. It is taken away as to areas larger than several of the largest States combined. Now, instead of going to a public office and saying, "I want to enter upon the land where I have settled my family," you must go and hunt up a forest ranger. You can not know beforehand whether you will have the land or have the right. You must first find the forestry officer and ascertain whether he will even consider your application. I have here the character of application that you are compelled to make, the rights which you must waive—the rights you possess and every other citizen of the United States possesses—and you must waive those rights as a condition precedent to exercising the rights of citizenship.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Idaho is perfectly aware that there is a double jurisdiction in his State, no matter whether the forest reserves are there or not. The Federal Government——

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will pardon me, I will not stop to be diverted by a proposition so obvious as that. I was talking about the rights of men, and the relation of men to the Government. I was not talking about court procedure and the dual jurisdiction of the United States courts and the State courts. We all know all about that; and it has nothing to do with this proposition.

Mr. DIXON. But the Senator started by urging that as one of his criticisms against the Forestry Service. There are some things as to which I agree with the Senator from Idaho. There is no question that so far as concerns the withdrawal of these great areas from taxation, so that the States get no revenue, an injustice is done to the States.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will allow me, I say——

Mr. DIXON. But I want to say to the Senator from Idaho in good faith, that so far as concerns criticising wholesale the creation of forest reserves, we are simply wasting our breath. The forest reserve is here; it has come to stay——

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, Mr. President, I have heard that——

Mr. DIXON. And all the power——

Mr. HEYBURN. I can not yield for the repetition of that old saw. I have seen it stated; that word has come to me; but I must proceed with the discussion of live questions.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho declines to yield.

Mr. DIXON. I want to make one more suggestion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho declines to yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not decline in discourtesy, but the old saying, by which it was thought perhaps you could terrorize somebody, that this system has come to stay, is no argument at all. We will see whether it has come to stay as the years roll on. When the opposition was first spoken in this Chamber there was very little interest in it, and it had been assumed that this was all right. That is not the condition to-day.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. For the benefit of the Senator from Montana I will state that I have in mind now 12 specific complaints from people of Colorado in regard to the regulations of forest reserves.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. PILES. There are many things the Senator from Idaho has said which have impressed me. They relate to matters of which I have personal cognizance. A number of people in my State have complained that they can not take up homesteads in forest reserves. What I want to ask the Senator is this: Has he formulated any general rule by which Congress can govern the forest reserves?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I can state it in a minute. Restore the right of the homesteader to make his home in them. Some of the gentlemen connected with the administration of the law seem to think they are governing the people and that the people only have the right to be there through their indulgence.

Mr. PILES. What I mean is this——

Mr. HEYBURN. Give the people back the rights they had six years ago.

Mr. PILES. I agree with the Senator there. Further, I want to ask a question about the rules and regulations governing the forest reserves. If he will frame a law along that line, I shall be glad to support it, and not leave it to rules and regulations.

Mr. HEYBURN. Abolish these rules and regulations. We have no right to give to anyone authority to make anything the law.

I love the forests. I was going to say I did so before the Senator from Utah was born. It would be true. To-day I would not live out of the sight of a forest. I have always selected my home where there were green trees and running streams and mountains; and I have never in my life wantonly cut a tree or destroyed one, and I have very seldom known another to do it. Men do not go out and cut down the forests for a pastime. They do it for the purpose of converting their labor into something useful and necessary. They trade trees for houses and fences and the great structures that make for civilization. You might imagine by the talk we hear and the twaddle we read in the newspapers about this thing that there were a lot of overindustrious people waiting with their axes in hand to go out and slaughter the forests. No Member of this body was ever so industrious as to cut down a tree, except as he was compelled to do it by some necessity. The same is true of other men. The danger is an imaginary one.

The remedy is to let the people govern themselves under the laws that they themselves shall make. Here in this bill we toss $5,000,000 in the air and say to these men, "Catch it and do as you please with it." There is not, in this provision of the bill appropriating $4,000,000, a restriction as to what they shall do with it. There is an enumeration of forty-odd items, without any restriction as to how much may be expended upon one or the other. It is what I call an irresponsible appropriation. Then just as cheerfully, at the first session of this Congress, on the motion of the Senator from Montana, who got up and moved it without any explanation, $500,000 was added to the appropriation, for the purpose of adding to the gayety of nations, I suppose. That is about all it did do.

Mr. DIXON. I think the purpose of the $500,000 had been developed by the speech of the Senator from Idaho two or three days previously.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know, and I imagine it was thought at the time to be one of the wisest things—probably a rival of anything that Solomon ever uttered. But these are questions of more importance and earnestness than would be indicated by the amendment of the Senator. In that hour, I will say not of irresponsibility—I will not charge that—but of careless attention the Senate did adopt an amendment giving $500,000 for nothing. Another case of tossing it up in the air and saying, "Catch it and do as you please with it."

Mr. DIXON. In justice the Senator from Idaho at least should state that that was for building roads and trails and for improvements through the States of Idaho and Montana and elsewhere.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am glad you mentioned it. In this bill I think they propose to expend in the neighborhood of a million dollars for building roads, highways, telephone lines, and buildings of various kinds. For whom? For these foresters. Who else needs them or uses them?

Mr. DIXON. I do not want to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. Do not be afraid.

Mr. DIXON. He showed some tenderness a while ago. Candidly and weighing my words, the Senator from Idaho is as well aware as any other man in the West that the expenditure of $600,000 carried in this bill, divided pro rata, for the development of an area of country half as big as all the territory east of the Mississippi, does not give $2 a section for building roads and trails and telephone lines and bridges for the development of 600,000,000,000 feet of timber. It is not 1 cent as compared to $10,000 for the development of this great property.

Mr. HEYBURN. For the development?

Mr. DIXON. Yes; for the development.

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to know what is meant by the word "development." The trees are there. They are fast to the ground. All you want is men to use them. That would mean prosperity. The development of them! For a forest ranger to gaze upon them and make his home among the trees? Is that development? It reminds me of a homely old triplet that I heard before the war, which used to be sung by the slaves, and it was like this:

> And they tore the market down
> For to beautify the town
> And make it look like the happy land of Canaan.

That is all. Talk about developing the forests! The forests need no developing. They want use. That is all they want.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Idaho——

Mr. HEYBURN. If that is all of that question——

Mr. DIXON. I want to say to the Senator from Idaho that it is a known fact that the fire protection and the fire patrol of the national forests, by its small army of forest rangers, saved more timber last year in the national forests than fifty times the $600,000 here appropriated.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am familiar with that expression. They are sending it out all over the country as literature. We have in the State of Idaho a legislative provision for caring for fires. The fires in the forests of Idaho are taken care of by our own citizens, who have more interest in them than any paid firemen hired by the Forestry Service. We expend more money in the State of Idaho, outside of the forest rangers, than they expend, and we are prompt in our action.

I have in my mind a case which occurred last summer. A fire up on St. Marys River was reported to a forest officer down by the reservation. He was requested to take his men and go and extinguish the fire. He said he would first have to report to Washington, and as soon as he got instructions he would then take the men in. In the meantime the patrol of private citizens there went up and extinguished the fire. The Senator from Montana must stay pretty close to home that he does not hear some of these things. I am out around among the people when I am at home.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Idaho and I are near neighbors as they measure distances in the West. He lives on one side of the mountain range and I on the other. I live right in the center of the forest reserves in my State. It is a funny proposition to me that none of these wonderful stories of outrage and of men in pea-green suits with feathers in their caps, who chase over the country and put the honest settlers off their homesteads at the point of the bayonet, reach my ears, just on the other side of the range from where the Senator lives.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is funny; I admit that.

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is funny. There is no question about its being funny. It is one of the funniest things I have ever heard.

Mr. President, the Senator suggests that they pay back to us a part of the proceeds of that which they take from us.

Mr. DIXON. I say they pay it all.

Mr. HEYBURN. It reminds me of the highwayman who takes your purse, and after he has it says: "Well, poor fellow, you will need some breakfast; here is a quarter out of your own purse." The Government of the United States has undertaken in defiance and violation of the constitution of Idaho to say what shall be done with the money that is the proceeds of the public lands. Our constitution says it can be used for only one purpose, and that is the maintenance of the schools, and yet the Forestry Service says: "Here is 15 cents; you must use it for public schools and public roads, and you must do it inside the forest reserves."

They have robbed the school fund of Idaho of a million acres of land which was given to it by Congress by a grant in præsenti. Title attached when the act was signed. You gave us that land. You did not use the language that was used as to Utah and in many other States, that "there may be" or that "the State may select." You did not use that language with Idaho. Those who had charge of that were shrewd, and looked to it, and the act said:

There is hereby granted to the State of Idaho sections 16 and 36.

That is a grant. And then you come along here and say to the Forestry Service: "You can go and take possession of that land which we gave to Idaho, shut it up, inclose it, keep people out of it."

The constitution of the State says it shall not be sold for less than $10 an acre for cash, and yet the Government of the United States goes in there and administers it as though it were its own private domain.

A nonresident landlord; our friend, as we were justly accustomed to regard him, until this craze came along; these theories, gathered up somewhere among the dust of empires, or the theories of monarchs, where the forester is lord of all. Congress, in 1890, it is true, said "We grant you this land for school purposes,"—a rich and magnificent endowment. More than $15,000,000 worth of land was given to Idaho for educational purposes. Now, they have come along and taken away $10,000,000 of that land and have shut it up in solitude, and, to use the pat phrase, the "system has come to stay." Do you imagine any people are going to rest easy under conditions like those?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I take it the Senator refers to sections 16 and 36.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Of course the Senator knows there is a law providing for the selection of lieu lands. Has the State of Idaho availed itself of that law?

Mr. HEYBURN. It does not apply to sections 16 and 36. It applies to land we are allowed to select in addition to those sections.

Mr. WARREN. It allows the selection of lands in lieu of sections 16 and 36.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; the law of Congress applies only to the States that did not take their land by grant. There are only three States, as I recall, that have in their constitutions a provision similar to that of the State of Idaho. In nearly every other case it says the State shall select lands, but as to Idaho it says "there is hereby granted to the State of Idaho." Now, they have undertaken, and the department cites in this book and prints the decisions——

Mr. WARREN. That is exactly the same in the case of a group of Western States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Only three.

Mr. WARREN. And the others have applied, or many of them have applied, for indemnity lands and have received them.

Mr. HEYBURN. They have violated their own constitutions.

Mr. WARREN. And Idaho, if she applied for the lands, would be permitted to select them.

Mr. HEYBURN. They will not be permitted to apply, and if they do it some other power will be invoked to protect the constitutional rights of the State.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment right here. I want to finish this part of the discussion. In the Use Book—I do not know what it is useful for—they cite the decision of the Supreme Court in regard to the New Mexico grant. The language there is in præsenti; but it is a Territory, and Congress can repeal its laws. It is not a sovereign State that may take title to anything. They cite that decision. I think the Senator's own State is one of the three as to which this language is used.

Mr. WARREN. I do not dispute that at all, but I will say to the Senator that these States exercised their preference, if they wished, and the lands have been patented to them in lieu of sections 16 and 36.

Mr. HEYBURN. But you can not do it under the Constitution.

Mr. WARREN. But they have done it.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; they only think they have done it. I know people who think they have accomplished legal propositions——

Mr. WARREN. They have legal title to the land and are renting or using it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me call attention to the constitutional provision. It is absolute:

The public-school fund of the State shall forever remain inviolate and intact; the interest thereon only shall be expended in the maintenance of the schools of the State, and shall be distributed among the several counties and school districts of the State in such manner as may be prescribed by law. No part of this fund, principal and interest, shall ever be transferred to any other fund or used or appropriated except as herein provided. * * *

The public-school fund of the State shall consist of the proceeds of such lands as have heretofore been granted, or may hereafter be granted, to the State by the General Government, known as school lands, and those granted in lieu of such.

The lieu lands referred to there are in lieu of the grant of so many cases made, for instance, for state capitol purposes, for the University of Idaho, for public buildings, and for several other purposes. They were not designated.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator may have his own idea of the law, and he may be correct, but the working fact is that they can select, they have selected, and are enjoying that selection.

Mr. HEYBURN. Not Idaho.

Mr. WARREN. The language is exactly the same, as the Senator knows, with reference to Wyoming, Idaho, and I think two or three other of the new States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Listen to this:

Provided, That no school lands shall be sold for less than $10 per acre. No law shall ever be passed by the legislature granting any privileges to persons who may have settled upon any such public lands subsequent to the survey thereof by the General Government by which the amount to be derived by the sale or other disposition of such lands shall be diminished, directly or indirectly.

It must be sold for $10 an acre for cash. The provision follows on. It must be sold only for cash.

Mr. WARREN. One moment. Will the Senator read the provision which says the land shall be sold only for cash? Perhaps it is there. I wish to hear it.

Mr. PILES. What are you reading from?

Mr. HEYBURN. From the constitution of Idaho.

Mr. WARREN. It is a part of the admission act of the State, I think.

Mr. HEYBURN. The constitution of Idaho stands in peculiar relation to the laws of the country. Congress adopted by specific provision this constitution. We had formed it——

Mr. WARREN. It was exactly the same in the other States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; and organized our government before we came to Congress for admission. They recite that we have adopted this constitution, and they give us the sanction of their enactment, which makes it a law of Congress as well as the constitution of the State, and it is irrepealable. Congress could not change a provision in that constitution, because it is the contract of statehood. It could not be repealed.

Mr. WARREN. Nevertheless, I think the Senator will find measures in the instrument itself for amending the constitution.

Mr. HEYBURN. But it must be amended in the manner provided in the constitution.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; but it can be amended.

Mr. HEYBURN. Congress can not amend it or violate it.

Mr. WARREN. But the State itself can.

Mr. HEYBURN. The State may, but it has not amended it in the particulars I have referred to. Now, not only do they claim——

Mr. WARREN. The Senator has not yet read to me where it is provided that the land shall be sold for cash, and I ask the question because no State so far has insisted upon selling its land for cash, and the terms upon which land has been sold have been entirely approved by the Government of the United States and by the state government.

Mr. HEYBURN. When I say "cash," I mean money. They make the payments graduated, but they must be in money. I mean they can not exchange the land for something else.

Mr. WARREN. I know of no inhibition against exchanging them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, there is, when the constitution says the land shall be sold for $10 an acre, that no law shall ever be passed, and so forth, and limits the number of sections that may be sold in any one year. It provides, as I say, that the lands may be sold only for money and for not less than $10 an acre.

That is only an incident to what I was discussing. I say this was an absolute grant to the State, because it says "There is hereby granted." That is in the admission act; and yet notwithstanding that, the Forestry Service is taking possession of it and depriving the State not only of the use of the land, or in case they might rent it, as they may, under the constitution, rent the surface rights for occupation, but they are depriving them of the benefit of settlement.

Sections 16 and 36 stand on an entirely different basis than that which has been suggested. They have prevented us from selecting them by refusing to survey them. I have been hammering at the door of Congress ever since I have been here to get money enough to survey those lands, so that we might get title to them, and I have not been able to do it. They deprive us of the lands in that way.

Now, another thing. The foresters and the Forestry Service claim the right to the waters of the State.

Mr. SMOOT. They do not.

Mr. HEYBURN. I may surprise the Senator from Utah for once.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me present this matter to him.

Mr. SMOOT. I have never understood that the Forestry Service claims any right to the waters in a State.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me read this telegram.

Mr. SMOOT. I mean the water itself.

Mr. HEYBURN. Here is what they tried to do. I saw the statement in the paper, and I telegraphed for the facts:

BOISE, IDAHO, May 2, 1908.

W. B. HEYBURN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Forest Supervisor Grand-Jean February 6 last filed applications on following creeks: Huckleberry, Greenhorn, Shake, Long Gulch, Paradise, Deer, Dooley, Lick, Beaver, Wilson, Boulder, Iron, Garfield, Eightmile, Silver, Warm Spring; also on North Fork of East Fork and North Fork of Wood River. Quantities claimed vary from 1 to 3 second-feet, apparently to be used for irrigation of small tracts near ranger stations—

That is, near these private homes they are establishing—in Boise, Blaine, Elmore, and Custer counties. Grand-Jean said it was not desired applications should be treated as in ordinary cases, but should simply be considered as formal notice that the Forest Service intended to appropriate the waters. It was insisted by this department—

This is from the state engineer—that they pass through usual routine, and February 13 they were returned to Grand-Jean for completion and fees. He was still doubtful whether state water law must be complied with—

That is, by the foresters—and said would take matter up with his superior, Mr. Pollock, at Salt Lake. Since then have heard nothing from applications, although state law requires return here in sixty days to hold right.

JAS. STEPHENSON, Jr.,
State Engineer.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I take it from the telegram just read that the Forestry Service do not claim that they have the right. They do claim, however, that they can file upon the water the same as any other concern.

Mr. HEYBURN. No other concern can do it. Citizens can do it.

Mr. SMOOT. The water of the State is absolutely in the control of the State.

Mr. HEYBURN. Absolutely.

Mr. SMOOT. The Supreme Court has so decided time and time again; and the Forestry Service do not claim that they have a right to the waters within the State.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not so understand it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will state it so that there will be no doubt about it. They claim that no man can go on a forest reserve and locate the waters of a stream without the consent and subject to such rules and regulations as they may make, notwithstanding the waters belong to the State.

Mr. SMOOT. There are no rules and regulations applying to the water, but they do claim the right to grant a permit, so that for any water power or power plant on government land in the forest reserves the parties are required to receive a permit from the department.

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what they claim.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have their rules here.

Mr. SMOOT. I will also say to the Senator I do not think there is any question but that every Senator here agrees with me that the Forestry Service have no control over the water of the State.

Mr. HEYBURN. They say here that—

Examiners of lands applied for under the act of June 11, 1906, are reminded that rights for logging roads and other uses necessary for the efficient administration of the forests may be withdrawn from all forms of entry in the same manner as administrative sites are withdrawn.

Then they go on and say:

Supervisors should make actual diversions of water needed for administrative use. After each diversion is made a record of it should be prepared by the supervisor. The record should give the name of the stream, the date on which the diversion was made, the method of diversion, etc.

Then they go on with the use of water and provide rules and regulations that must be complied with by any party desiring to take water within a forest reserve.

I will not undertake to read these rules, because they are rather lengthy, some of them occupying a page. I state from the rules that they claim the right to prescribe limitations as to the manner of the use of the water in a natural stream of a State by citizens of the State in contravention of the laws of the State, and they are continually exercising it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not desire to say any more than that I know from the Forester himself that they do not claim that they have the right to the water within a State.

Mr. HEYBURN. He instructs them here to locate it.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I understand; a little water for use.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no limit on it.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think the Senator means that as to all the water within a forest reserve the ranger is instructed to go and file upon it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not suppose the Senator understood me to say anything of the kind.

Mr. SMOOT. That would be the only way; I suppose that they would be instructed to file upon the whole of it if they were going to control it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, no; not at all. An individual does not do that.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the senior Senator from Idaho yield to the junior Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. There is not any reason why he should not file on all of it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Idaho knows that the only way he can secure title to the water is by use. The forester could not obtain title to the water unless he used the water. He has to use it. He then files on it under the laws of the State. The state engineer sees to it.

Mr. BORAH. But when he files upon it in our State he has a long time in which to begin to make use of it, and during that time the citizen is deprived of any opportunity to get it.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know how long they are entitled to hold it in Idaho. In Wyoming I am told that it is one year. In our State it is a longer time.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have permission from the Committee on Public Lands to state an occurrence in that committee this morning. There is before the Committee on Public Lands a bill granting a right of way to a railroad company to construct its road through a forest reserve. Congress said that railroad company should have the right of way, and it has complied with the requirements of Congress. But the Secretary of Agriculture refused to grant it the right that Congress gave it, and the committee this morning refused to report favorably a bill granting the right of way to this railroad company through the forest reserve, notwithstanding that it has complied with every requirement of the act of Congress, because the Secretary does not approve it.

There has grown up a vicious practice in some departments of Congress in submitting bills introduced by members of this body for the approval or disapproval of executive officers, secretaries, and clerks, and it is being carried to such an extent that under certain conditions it is impossible, if some clerk, or secretary, forsooth, does not approve of it, to secure a favorable report. The judgment of a Senator counts for nothing; the righteousness of the bill counts for nothing. The question is, Have we the approval of these clerks? I do not know how long it will last. I trust not very long.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. You will disconnect me, because I was just going to cite, in connection with what I said, the language of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SMOOT. After the Senator finishes that I will take the floor.

Mr. HEYBURN. Reciting the fact that this railroad company has in effect complied with the act of Congress and reciting the act which was passed by Congress, he says:

The act of March 3, 1875, as amended by the act of March 3, 1899, gives a right of way to railroads through national forests subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior—

Then he quotes—

when in his judgment the public interests will not be injuriously affected thereby.

So he may hold up a railroad. This is a part of a great system, probably the greatest system of electric roads in the United States. He refuses that which Congress gives to this applicant, and he does it because he does not approve of it. He says:

I believe that there is no reason why a right of way, properly conditioned to protect the interests of the public and especially to preserve the timber and water-power sites, can not be speedily granted by the Secretary of the Interior under the existing law.

He says it could be done, but he refuses to exercise the power to give us the right of way. I say "us." I have no interest in the bill.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator one question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I observe that the Senator inveighed against the reference of bills to the heads of departments. I do not suppose he wishes us to understand that we should discontinue that practice altogether. As I understand the references by committees of bills to heads of departments, it is to obtain, among other information, that from the department without thereby, in asking for it, in any way promising to follow their suggestions.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; the evil is not in giving the information. It is perfectly proper to call for information. But the evil is in saying at the end of it "We recommend that this bill shall not pass." What of their business is it what Congress does in the way of legislation? Why should they recommend what Congress in the exercise of its wisdom shall do in a given case?

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that it was an act of Congress which conferred that power upon the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; which he refuses to exercise.

Mr. SMOOT. It was an act passed March 3, 1899, and is found in Thirtieth Statutes at Large, page 1233. That statute gives—a right of way to railroads through national forests, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, when in his judgment the public interests will not be injuriously affected thereby.

Mr. President, in this particular case the Secretary of Agriculture does not object to giving the right of way, provided it is protected and granted to the railroad company on the same terms and under the same conditions proposed as to other roads.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not here to attack the Secretary and I am not here to ask for a right of way for railroads. I am here to illustrate by this instance the fact that these reserves stand in the way of the development and the progress of the country and that you are liable to run against just such circumstances, regardless of the question whether he is right or whether he is not right.

Mr. President, I feel that I have trespassed upon the attention of the Senate long enough. There are great questions involved here, questions of government, that go to the very foundation of the rights of the citizen and the rights of the State. I am in favor of protecting the forests and the trees. I am in favor of multiplying them, if you please. We need no addition to the forests of Idaho. We are glad to parcel out the product of them to other States. But I do not want the other States to come in and take possession of us and administer upon our State.

There is talk about preserving and conserving public utilities. Here in Washington, surrounded by the glitter of a banquet, they talk about them in poetic phrase and strain. Right under their eyes here are scrub oak and scrub pine surrounding the city of Washington on the worn-out tobacco lands. Why does not the Government establish a model enterprise for the restoration of the forests upon these lands close to Washington? Why do they want to go to a State that has 12,000,000 or 15,000,000 acres of splendid timber that nature has put there to do their experimenting, their reforestation?

I can take them within thirty minutes of this city and show them a most magnificent opportunity to develop their system or scheme for reforesting lands. Why do they want to go out West in those new parts of the country where to touch the machinery is to retard the speed of their growth, to teach us how to conserve the natural resources, the waters of the streams?

In this letter the Secretary says that provision must be made for conserving the water in the rivers that would be cut by this railroad. It is a splendid instance of the inconsistent and incompetent plans that are proposed. Here are the Great Falls of the Potomac right under the shadow of the Capitol, with more horsepower going to waste every day than the Government will ever conserve in a hundred years in that part of the country for actual use. And yet it is a case of green fields and far away and going somewhere else to do these things. Why do they not do them in the neighborhood of this city beautiful, the city of Washington? There are squalid, worn-out, and rutted lands at their door. They go out into our new State, where we have the energy and purpose and the strength to preserve all the possibilities that God placed there for man.

We are demonstrating the fact that we are in earnest, because we more than doubled our population in the last decade, and when the census shall come in next year you will find that we have multiplied our population and our wealth by three or four times. And we are doing it in spite of this blighting influence. We are doing it in spite of this attempt to push us backward. We are not content, and we will never yield this controversy here or elsewhere until we have compelled justice at the hands of the Government. We want the United States to come into our State and dwell there as it dwells here and in other States. We do not want it to come in there and commence the process of crimping and nagging that marks the conduct to-day. Just give us the opportunity to grow. We will not destroy the timber. Why should we? Who has half as much interest in it as the people in Idaho? Their future is wrapped up in the possibilities of these natural resources, and they know it. They were not drones when they went there. They were men beaming with hope and stored with energy and intelligence enough to get away from the ruts and grooves. They are there, and they are being bothered, they are being hampered by dead lines, beyond which they can not step except with the consent of a stranger.

They have acted like vandals in our midst. This Government of ours, of which we are so proud, instead of being the friend of the people of the State, have come there like invaders and sought to stay our growth and our progress, playing into the hands of a monopoly.

I believe in free pasture. You could not have sent the white-covered wagons through the State of Illinois or the State of Iowa except through the right of free pasture to maintain the flocks that supported your family in the early days until the land was parceled up by legal lines. Here to-day, under the false pretense of creating forest reserves, they have seized upon at least 9,000,000 acres of nonforest land, and when some stranger tells the senior Senator from Iowa that is not true, you can tell him that you know from men who know the facts that it is true. They come out there heralded with an order calling in these forest rangers as a huntsman sounds upon his bugle, and they come at the expense of the Government.

At the end of the last session I had printed, in response to a resolution which I introduced, a statement of the cost of the expenses of those rangers in attending functions. There was more than $50,000 in that bill, and there is twice that amount in this bill, to enable some of those men to go around lecturing in the public schools and in the Young Women's and Young Men's Christian Associations, at banquets here and there, charging their expenses up to the Government, trying to build up a sentiment in favor of this forestry purpose, or plan, or whatever they choose to call it.

I do not like to dwell upon small things, but as an instance of the petty, little, mean way in which they are doing this service I had forwarded to me here an affidavit from one of the men in their employ setting forth that during the past fall, only a few months ago, he was employed by these foresters to gather pine nuts out of squirrels' nests at the beginning of the winter. He gathered some 40 or 50 bushels, and they had, I think he says, 145 bushels on hand ready to ship, taken out of squirrels' nests. It is a trivial matter. I mentioned it one day to some of these enterprising newspaper reporters, and they sent it out as a joke. It was no joke to the squirrels. I can imagine the kind of man who would consider it as a joke.

Mr. WARREN. For what purpose did they gather the nuts? To what was it proposed to devote them?

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, to reforest a State with 20,000,000 acres of forest reserves in it. The poor squirrels gather them with the wing on the nut, take them into their nests in the fall at their leisure, and then take out the pine nut and use the wing for nests.

Mr. DOLLIVER. They were using those to plant trees in the sand barrens of western Nebraska.

Mr. HEYBURN. I expect there is some beautiful forest growing there.

Mr. DOLLIVER. There will be. Those trees are coming up there by the million. I do not think the Senator ought to waste too much sympathy on the squirrels.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not doing it. I only speak of it as one of those little, trivial, petty things that oftentimes point a moral.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Would you gather the seeds of those pine trees one at a time, or would you take advantage of the industry of the squirrel?

Mr. HEYBURN. I can say this, and I say it in all good feeling, if the Senator from Iowa could approve of that kind of act, I would be disappointed in him. I know him better. He would have joined with the other boys and thrashed a boy who would have done it when he was a boy.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Is it not the same thing that we do with the honeybee?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator does not want to convince me that he would approve that kind of a thing. I do not believe it. I would not like to be convinced of it.

No; I did not speak of it as a matter of controlling importance. I speak of it to show how wild they can be; that when they once get away from practical paths into the field of irresponsibility they are liable to do anything.

Mr. SMOOT. To what extent was this done?

Mr. HEYBURN. He received $2.50 a day for it, and got from 8 to 10 bushels of nuts from each nest he robbed. He had about 45 bushels of them on hand, and with others who were employed they had altogether about 150 bushels.

Mr. SMOOT. This was done by only one man.

Mr. HEYBURN. He is speaking of what he did, and merely incidentally of what the others did. He did not think of it as being very cruel.

Mr. SMOOT. Is he in the service now?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not know. I regret having digressed into a small item like that.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask the Senator, as it is evident we will not be able to determine the matter of forest reserves to-day, if it would be inconvenient to lay this question aside for the present and go on with the reading of the bill a little further?

Mr. HEYBURN. I would be very glad to do it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be proceeded with for action on unobjected amendments, and that no other legislative business be done during this legislative day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent——

Mr. WARREN. Let me understand the Senator. I understand he has made a proposition to proceed with the bill this evening for action upon unobjected amendments.

Mr. CARTER. And that no other business shall be done on this legislative day.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope there will be no agreement of that kind. I have promised that there should be a brief executive session.

Mr. CARTER. I withdraw the request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request is withdrawn.

Mr. DIXON. I was inadvertently called out of the Chamber. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether we have finished the amendments regarding forest reserves?

Mr. WARREN. Those amendments have gone over for the day.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to offer an amendment in line 24——

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will have an opportunity to offer his amendment; but being other than a committee amendment, it will not be in order until we finish the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Chemistry," on page 29, after line 16, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with the agricultural colleges in the several States and Territories for the purpose of demonstrating and illustrating the best methods for the making of denatured alcohol on a scale suitable for utilization by the farmer, or associations of farmers, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all other necessary expenses, $15,000.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee to explain that paragraph.

Mr. WARREN. Let the paragraph go over until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to make a point of order against the amendment and have it pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the point of order?

Mr. PENROSE. That the amendment proposes general legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order will be regarded as pending.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 30, line 1, after the words "eight hundred and," to strike out "five" and insert "twenty," so as to make the clause read:

In all for general expenses, $820,000.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I suggest that evidently the amendment in line 1, page 30——

Mr. WARREN. The Senator knows that we will change that if the other amendment is rejected.

Mr. BAILEY. I imagine it would be, because this amendment was evidently increased to conform to the preceding amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Let the amendment be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 30, line 4, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eighty" and insert "ninety-five," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Chemistry, $895,560.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I am appealed to by Senators around me, who wish to discontinue for the day the consideration of the pending bill, but I am obliged to say that unless we make better progress to-morrow than we made yesterday and have made to-day, we shall be compelled either to finally leave the bill uncompleted or to have night sessions. I had hoped we might proceed a little further with the bill to-night, but in view of the circumstances I now ask that the bill be laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 25, 1909, at 12 o'clock meridian.

INJUNCTION OF SECRECY REMOVED.

The injunction of secrecy was removed on February 24 from treaties between the United States and the Republics of Panama and Colombia relating to the Panama Canal, etc., both signed on January 9, 1909. (Ex. N, 60th, 2d.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 24, 1909.

[Continuation of legislative day of Tuesday, February 23, 1909.]

The recess having expired, the House at 11 o'clock a. m., was called to order by the Speaker.

SABINE AND NECHES RIVERS.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 27363) to provide for improving the navigable capacity of the Sabine and Neches rivers, and the canal connecting the Sabine and Neches rivers with the mouth of Taylors Bayou, with the committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill, with the committee amendments. The bill was read yesterday and the Clerk will now read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection I made yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his objection. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Texas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER, YANKTON, S. DAK.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 7378) to extend the time for the completion of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Yankton, S. Dak., by the Winnipeg, Yankton and Gulf Railroad Company.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 6 of the act approved April 5, 1904, authorizing the Winnipeg, Yankton and Gulf Railroad Company to construct a combined railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Yankton, S. Dak., as amended by the act approved May 20, 1908, be, and the same is hereby, so amended that the time within which the said bridge is required to be commenced shall be within one year and the time within which it is required that the said bridge shall be completed shall be within three years from the date the approval of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INTERNATIONAL FIELD SPORTS, VIENNA.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to lay on the table the motion to reconsider made by me yesterday, by which the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from further consideration of the President's message of January 4, 1909, relative to the International Shooting and Field Sports Exposition in Vienna, and the same was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman entered a motion to reconsider yesterday, and he now asks unanimous consent to lay that motion on the table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 8446. An act amending an act entitled "An act to amend an act to provide the time and places for holding terms of the United States court in the States of Idaho and Wyoming," approved June 1, 1898.

S. 9278. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war and to certain dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 9421. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to certain widows and dependent and helpless relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 9422. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war, and to certain widows and helpless and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 5729. An act to correct the records and authorize the reenlistment of certain noncommissioned officers and enlisted men belonging to companies B, C, and D of the Twenty-fifth U. S. Infantry, who were discharged without honor under Special Orders, No. 266, War Department, November 9, 1906, and the restoration to them of all rights of which they have been deprived on account thereof.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 26072. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to notify the House of Representatives of the cancellation of the signature of the Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate to the enrolled bill (H. R. 25155) to amend an act approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," in accordance with concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives No. 68.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 8446. An act amending an act entitled "An act to amend an act to provide the time and places for holding terms of the United States court in the States of Idaho and Wyoming, approved June 1, 1898"—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 9278. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war and to certain dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 9421. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war and to certain widows and dependent and helpless relatives of such soldiers and sailors—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 5729. An act to correct the records and authorize the reenlistment of certain noncommissioned officers and enlisted men belonging to Companies B, C, and D of the Twenty-fifth U. S. Infantry, who were discharged without honor under Special Orders, No. 266, War Department, November 9, 1906, and the restoration to them of all rights of which they have been deprived on account thereof—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 9422. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and to certain widows and helpless and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF NAVIGATION CONGRESSES.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 203 to authorize the Secretary of State to invite the Permanent International Association of Navigation Congresses to hold in the United States in the year 1911 the Twelfth International Congress of Navigation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to extend to the Permanent International Association of Navigation Congresses, whose permanent executive office is in Brussels, Belgium, and of which association the Government of the United States is a contributing member by authority of act of Congress approved June 28, 1902, an invitation to hold in the city of Philadelphia the Twelfth International Congress of Navigation at such time in the calendar year 1911 as may be selected by said association.

Mr. GARRETT. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. CARLIN. I would like to ask the gentleman if this contemplates an appropriation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It does not.

Mr. CARLIN. Will an appropriation necessarily follow it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know of none. This resolution is on all fours with the other resolutions of the same kind that have been passed, extending an invitation to an international organization that proposes to come here and hold its convention.

Mr. GARRETT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman what good purpose this is to serve?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The purpose of the resolution is to have the United States Government do the same thing for the international congress that other governments do when the convention is held under the auspices of other governments, which is to extend the hand of hospitality to those attending that convention. The matter is of great concern to all of us who are interested in waterways in this as well as in other countries.

Mr. GARRETT. It is a congress of navigation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A congress to consider navigation matters, deep waterways, and better harbors.

Mr. GARRETT. Have there been congresses of this kind held before?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There have; all on the other side of the water.

Mr. GARRETT. And to which this Government has been invited?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To which this Government has sent representatives.

Mr. GARRETT. How much is it going to cost?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I presume the cost of the reception and entertainment would approximate $25,000.

Mr. GARRETT. And how is that worth anything to us?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It will be invaluable to the United States in teaching some of our statesmen and engineers and some of our commercial people the importance of deeper waterways in the United States.

Mr. GARRETT. But we have, or soon will have, a commission to go to Europe and study those things.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not think the commission has yet been constituted.

Mr. GARRETT. And the gentleman thinks it will cost about $25,000?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think it will cost the Government nothing.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not think the gentleman from Tennessee quite heard my answer.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that it was not the intention to ask the Government for any appropriation; that the cost on account of the invitation will be wholly met by local authorities.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is what I said. In this connection I ask to have read a letter from the mayor of the city of Philadelphia.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
PHILADELPHIA.

Col. JAMES C. SANFORD, U. S. Army,
Newport, R. I.

DEAR SIR: Following my conversation with you yesterday in reference to the Triennial Congress of the Permanent International Association of Navigation Congresses, I desire to convey to you the sincere and cordial invitation of the city of Philadelphia to the triennial convention, inviting them to hold their next meeting in this city.

Philadelphia is in the forefront of the movement for better waterways and for the fuller development of American navigation, as you well know. As a convention city it lacks nothing, and may I urge that you consider our request, in order that this city may have the high honor and distinction of entertaining at the next triennial congress the distinguished representatives of the international association?

Cordially, yours,

JOHN E. REYBURN, Mayor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, answering further the gentleman from Tennessee, the citizens of Philadelphia will furnish the cost of this entertainment. It will be necessary to come in contact with the Government of the United States to have the proper officials represented at the convention; but the plan is, upon the passage of this resolution, to have formed in the city of Philadelphia an association which will take into consideration the matter of raising funds and make all other necessary arrangements for properly and hospitably receiving the gentlemen from abroad.

It has been the custom in every foreign country where conventions have been held for the patronage of the king or the ruling potentate to be extended to those who came from foreign governments, and they have made appropriations for this purpose equaling $25,000. We do not, in this instance, ask a single dollar from the Government of the United States. Bringing this convention to the United States will mean very much to us as a help in engineering and progressive methods. We know very little about waterways.

The old countries know much more; they are much further advanced in the matter of engineering. We want this international convention to come here for the first time, that we may have an interchange of views. The citizens of Philadelphia will bear the expense and the Government will be under no expense. It seems to me that the gentleman from Tennessee ought to withdraw his objection, because this resolution does not contemplate any expenditure, although they have been granted to others seeking to extend similar courtesies.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, if we are assured that there is to be no appropriation following this, I certainly will withdraw the objection. I would not stand in the way of the city of Philadelphia in the matter, but if there is to be an appropriation I want to object now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no thought of introducing any measure asking for an appropriation. I do not think it fair, however, that one city should come in and ask for an appropriation and get it, as has been done heretofore, for an international congress and then that there should be imposed upon us a pledge that we shall not ask what has been accorded to others.

I am willing to say to the gentleman that we shall ask no help. The reputation of the city of Philadelphia is sufficient the world over to satisfy most people that we will perform every act required of us in the matter of hospitality and in the matter of entertainment; but we do want to perform a greater service in this regard in showing to this Nation, which is yet young in the development of its waterways, what has been done in the older world and what can be done here if we take counsel of those who have had older and wider experience.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that in so far as his suggestions as to other associations receiving appropriations and this one not receiving any being unfair, I am personally opposed to those others receiving appropriations, and there is nothing personal in this matter which I have raised. I think it is a good time to stop these appropriations, and I shall not object to the request of the gentleman if there is no appropriation to follow. If there is one, I shall object.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let this be the beginning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD, ASHTABULA, OHIO.

Mr. THOMAS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 15939) authorizing the Secretary of War to exchange property, and to consider the same at this time, which bill I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to exchange property now occupied by the Light-House Board at Ashtabula, Ohio, for other property of not less value at another location and to make a contract for such exchange.

With the following amendments:

In line 4 strike out the words "and directed;" and amend the title so as to read:

"A bill authorizing the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to exchange property."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to know if this bill has been unanimously reported by a committee?

Mr. THOMAS of Ohio. It has.

Mr. SULZER. What committee?

Mr. THOMAS of Ohio. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. SULZER. I would also like to know just what this bill does, what property is to be exchanged, and where the property is located.

Mr. THOMAS of Ohio. It is located in Ashtabula, Ohio. It is the exchanging of two town lots owned by the Government for two other town lots of the same value.

Mr. SULZER. In the same city?

Mr. THOMAS of Ohio. In the same place.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

CRIMES COMMITTED ON LAKE MICHIGAN.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 249, to enable the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Michigan to determine the jurisdiction of crimes committed on Lake Michigan with amendments, which I send to the desk and ask to have read as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 249.

Resolved, etc., That the consent of the Congress of the United States is hereby given to the States of Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, and Michigan, or any two or more of them, by such agreement or compact as they may deem desirable or necessary or otherwise, not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States or any law thereof, to adjudge and settle the jurisdiction to be exercised by said States, respectively, over offenses arising out of the violation of the laws of said States upon the waters of Lake Michigan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have some explanation of the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is exactly the same as the resolutions recently passed giving the States bordering on the Mississippi the right to enter into an agreement concerning the jurisdiction over crimes committed on the Mississippi. This would give to the States of Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, and Michigan the right to enter into an agreement concerning the jurisdiction over crimes committed on Lake Michigan where it is now impossible to tell the location of the boundary lines.

Mr. SULZER. Would this resolution change the venue?

Mr. MANN. This resolution would permit the States of Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin, and Michigan to enter into an agreement respecting crimes committed on Lake Michigan, and they would probably follow the precedent already in existence, which is the one relating to jurisdiction over crimes committed on the Potomac River, an old contract entered into in 1785 between Maryland and Virginia. That authorizes the State of Maryland to punish a crime committed by one of her citizens on the river, regardless of whether it is committed in Virginia or in Maryland, and authorizes the State of Virginia to punish one of her citizens for a crime committed on the river without proving the exact location of the crime on the river. In other words, it is impossible to tell whether a crime is committed on one side of the imaginary line or the other.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it not also true that in rivers like the Mississippi River, or any navigable river, there is a part of the river—in its channel—where neither of the States has jurisdiction. Are not crimes committed in the channel of the river supposed to be under the jurisdiction of the United States and not under the jurisdiction of either State?

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if this in any way affects the jurisdiction of the Federal Government touching the boundaries between the United States and Canada, if that is involved?

Mr. MANN. Not at all. It does not reach Canada.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I would ask the gentleman whether or not the gentleman knows of any disagreement between the respective States heretofore in regard to criminal jurisdiction on the lakes?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, take, for instance, Calumet Harbor, within the limits of the harbor, within half a mile of the shore line at south Chicago, the north state line of Indiana comes to the west state line of Indiana in the water. No one knows exactly where that line is. It is impossible to tell where the line in Lake Michigan is between Wisconsin and Michigan or between Illinois and Michigan, and the result has been that various people have gone out in boats onto Lake Michigan for the very purpose of committing crime, and they could not be punished because it was impossible to tell whether jurisdiction of the crime belonged in Indiana or in Illinois or in Michigan.

Now, this bill would permit either State, having entered into the agreement—of course this does not bind the States, the Constitution requiring that States can not enter into a compact without the consent of Congress—if this consent be given, then these States can make compacts by which each State will have the authority to punish its own citizens for crimes committed on the Lakes without proving exactly the place of the commission of the crime.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Suppose the crime should be committed by some one not a resident of either State?

Mr. MANN. We would have the situation that exists in regard to the Potomac River——

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask one question and make a suggestion as to this bill. It is very difficult for us to understand in the confusion here what this bill is in its full scope; therefore I would like to ask whether it undertakes to fix the place where persons charged with crimes are to be brought.

Mr. MANN. It simply permits the States to enter into an agreement between themselves as to the jurisdiction over crimes, following the precedent of the agreement entered into between the States of Maryland and Virginia concerning crimes committed on the Potomac River.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the provision of the Constitution of the United States on that subject—section 2 of article 3. If the gentleman will allow me I will read it—

The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; and when not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed.

Now, I do not understand we can delegate that power to the States to try a person for a crime committed in another State.

There is another provision in the Constitution of the United States which seems to settle this question. When the Constitution was framed in 1787 one of the things that gave rise to discussion was its provision relating to the prosecutions for crime. It was contended that sufficient protection was not given to the accused, and before the Constitution was ratified it was practically agreed an article would be added on that subject. Other articles amending the Constitution were also in like manner agreed upon. Accordingly the First Congress, on the 25th of September, 1789, submitted for ratification ten amendments, all of which were later ratified and became part of the Constitution.

The sixth of these amendments reads as follows:

In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

This article appears plainly to require a person accused of a crime committed either under state or federal law to be tried in the State and district where the crime was committed, but I am not familiar with the decisions.

Mr. MANN. But, if the gentleman will refresh his recollection, he is too good a lawyer not to remember that provision of the Constitution only applies to crimes committed against the Federal Government and has no application to crimes committed against States.

Mr. KEIFER. I think it does have application in all cases and it is general. I am not very familiar with the decisions on that subject, I admit, but I think this is in violation of the Constitution——

Mr. MANN. The Supreme Court has passed upon the question in the Maryland and Virginia case, and has upheld the compact entered into between those two States.

Mr. KEIFER. If that is so I shall not object, but I still have my doubts.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I have not had a chance to read the bill. Does it provide where a State——

Mr. MANN. Let me tell you what it does provide. I will say it does not provide that——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does it provide that the State that first gets the body of the offender shall have jurisdiction over the crime?

Mr. MANN. It only provides the State of Michigan and the State of Illinois may enter into an agreement concerning jurisdiction; that is all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

To enable the States of Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, and Michigan to determine the jurisdiction of crimes committed on Lake Michigan.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in order that I may insert a map, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the northern boundary line of Indiana runs west through the southern end of Lake Michigan to the boundary line between Illinois and Indiana, which it meets in the lake. The boundary line between Illinois and Michigan is in the center of Lake Michigan, so that at one point in the lake near South Chicago and in the Calumet Harbor is the dividing line between Illinois and Indiana, and at another point in the lake the territorial limits of the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Michigan all meet. Under these circumstances it is difficult, if not impossible, to punish crime committed on the lake near or adjacent to these points, as it is impossible in many cases to prove the venue.

The purpose of the resolution is to permit the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Michigan, by proper acts of their legislatures, to enter into arrangements by which persons committing offenses on Lake Michigan, where it is now often practically impossible to prove the State in which the offense is committed, may be punished by the authorities of that State which first secures jurisdiction of the person, or such other arrangement as the States may determine among themselves. This is following the precedent under which crimes committed on the Potomac River may in certain cases be punished either by the authorities of Virginia or Maryland, although the jurisdiction of Virginia otherwise would not extend.

In recent years there have been occasions when persons owning or hiring lake vessels deliberately engaged in the commission of offenses which would have been punishable in either Indiana, Illinois, or Michigan, but where no punishment was or could be inflicted because of the impossibility of showing the State in which the offense was committed or proving the venue.

In 1784 Maryland and Virginia each appointed commissioners to consider the subject of the jurisdiction and navigation of the Potomac River, constituting the boundary line between those two States. This action resulted in a compact between the two States, which was ratified by the legislatures thereof, providing, among other things, for certain concurrent jurisdiction over piracies, crimes, or other offenses committed on the waters of the Potomac River where it forms their boundary. Though this compact was entered into prior to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, it has been held by the Supreme Court in Wharton v. Wise (153 U. S., 155) to be still in force, though the Supreme Court did not decide that such compact, if entered into after the adoption of the Constitution, might not have been in violation of that provision of the Constitution which declares that "no State shall without the consent of Congress * * * enter into an agreement or compact with another State." * * *

The plat [on opposite page], showing the boundary lines of the States referred to, shows the necessity of joint jurisdiction.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up the conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report and in lieu thereof that the statement of the managers on the part of the House be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report and that the statement be read in lieu thereof. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 23464) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 28, 39, 40, 83, 84, 95, 99, 102, 105, 106, 109, 112, 113, 114, 131, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, and 189.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 24, 25, 26, 27, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 38, 41, 42, 44, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 69, 70, 71, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 96, 97, 98, 101, 103, 104, 107, 110, 111, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 132, 133, 134, 135, 137, 138, 139, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 158, 159, 160, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 171, 172, 173, 174, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 190, 191, and 208,

And agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following: " ; hire of horse and wagon for the Secretary's office, four hundred and twenty dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 7: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "eighty thousand four hundred and thirty dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "one hundred and forty-four thousand nine hundred and twenty dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 37: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "one hundred and sixty-seven thousand seven hundred and forty-four dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 59: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 59, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said Senate amendment insert the following:

"Index to the Statutes at Large: For continuing the preparation of an index to the Statutes at Large of the United States, ten thousand dollars, to be expended by the Librarian of Congress for the salaries of the persons whom he employs to prepare the index and for incidental expenses; the scope, classification, and style of the index to be such as the Judiciary Committees of the two Houses of Congress shall direct or approve."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That under the authority of House concurrent resolution 67, this session, the bill be amended as follows: On page 40, lines 18 and 19, strike out the words "twelve thousand dollars" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "eight thousand dollars, and the annual compensation of the Secretary of State, including all emoluments or allowances fixed by law, except such as were fixed by law prior to the twenty-sixth day of February, nineteen hundred and seven, after the third day of March, nineteen hundred and nine, is hereby fixed at eight thousand dollars, and all laws or parts of laws providing different compensation, emoluments, or allowances are hereby repealed, to take effect on the third day of March, nineteen hundred and nine, except that so much of the unexpended balance of the appropriation of twelve thousand dollars for the salary of the Secretary of State for the fiscal year nineteen hundred and nine as may be necessary is hereby made available to pay the said salary as herein fixed at the rate of eight thousand dollars per annum from March fourth until June thirtieth, nineteen hundred and nine, inclusive."

Amendment numbered 72: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 72, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert the following: "chief clerk, two thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 100: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 100, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "forty thousand nine hundred and eighty dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 108: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 108, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "three thousand five hundred dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 136: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 136, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert the following: "one clerk of class four;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 140: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 140, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the matter inserted by said Senate amendment, and strike out, on page 111, lines 21 and 22, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "six Indian inspectors, not required to be engineers, now employed and appropriated for in the Indian Department, at two thousand five hundred dollars each, and said Indian inspectors shall hereafter be termed inspectors, and shall be included in the classified service;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 156: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 156, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the number proposed by said amendment insert the following: "six;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 157: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 157, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "sixty-one thousand two hundred dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 161: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 161, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "sixty-six thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 169: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 169, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the number proposed insert "five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 170: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 170, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following: "four copyists of maps, at nine hundred dollars each;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 182: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 182, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "eight thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

On amendments numbered 43, 46, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 209, and 210, the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

HENRY H. BINGHAM,
F. H. GILLETT,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

F. E. WARREN,
J. A. HEMENWAY,
H. M. TELLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 23464) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year 1910, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying report as to each of the amendments of the Senate, namely:

On amendments Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, and 44 and 45, all relating to the salaries of officers and employees and other expenses of the Senate, are all recommended to be agreed to by the House, except the amendment increasing the pay of conductors of elevators in the Senate wing of the Capitol to $1,400, from which it is recommended that the Senate recede.

On amendments Nos. 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, and 55, relating to the House of Representatives: Provides for 18 additional conductors, at $1,200, for the House wing of the Capitol building and for the House of Representatives Office Building; fixes the salary of the clerk to the Committee on Naval Affairs at $2,400, and increases the salary of the assistant clerk of conference minority from $1,500 to $1,800.

On amendments Nos. 56, 57, and 58: Increases the salaries of the register of copyrights from $3,000 to $3,500 and of the assistant register of copyrights from $2,500 to $3,000, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 59: Appropriates a lump sum of $10,000 for continuing the preparation of an index to the Statutes at Large, to be expended by the Librarian of Congress for the salaries of persons whom he employs to prepare the index and for incidental expenses, in lieu of specific salaries proposed by the House, aggregating $8,940, and the specific salaries proposed by the Senate, aggregating $10,740.

On amendments Nos. 69, 70, and 71: Provides for a clerk at $1,600, instead of a clerk at $1,400, in the Division of Loans and Currency of the Treasury, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 208: Provides for two assistant messengers for the Court of Claims, as proposed by the Senate.

The committee of conference has been unable to agree on the following amendments of the Senate, namely:

On amendment No. 43, striking out the provision for carriage and horses for the Vice-President.

On amendment No. 46, increasing the salary of the Speaker of the House of Representatives to $15,000.

On amendments Nos. 60 and 61, increasing the compensation of the President to $100,000.

On amendments Nos. 62 and 63, increasing the compensation of the Vice-President to $15,000.

On amendments Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, and 68, relating to the State Department, providing, as proposed by the Senate, for an Undersecretary, at $10,000; for a Fourth Assistant Secretary, at $4,500; a private secretary, at $2,500; and a clerk, at $1,500, to the Undersecretary; and a private messenger, at $1,000, to the Secretary of State.

On amendments Nos. 192, 193, and 194, increasing the salaries of the Chief Justice and eight associate justices of the Supreme Court $2,000 each.

On amendments Nos. 195, 196, and 197, increasing the salaries of the 29 circuit judges $2,000 each.

On amendments Nos. 198 and 199, increasing the salaries of the 84 district judges $2,000 each.

On amendments Nos. 200, 201, and 202, increasing the salaries of the 3 justices of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia $2,000 each.

On amendments Nos. 203, 204, and 205, increasing the salaries of the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia $2,000 each.

On amendments Nos. 206, 207, and 209, increasing the salaries of the judges of the Court of Claims $1,500 each.

On amendment No. 210, establishing as the legal salaries of the justices and judges of the United States the rates of compensation appropriated for in the bill for the fiscal year 1910.

Under authority granted by the concurrent resolution of the two Houses a provision is inserted in the bill fixing the compensation of the Secretary of State at $8,000 per annum after March 3, 1909, and appropriating for the same at that rate for the fiscal year 1910, and making available the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $12,000 for the salary of the Secretary of State for the current fiscal year to pay said compensation at the rate of $8,000 per annum from March 4 to June 30, 1909, inclusive.

HENRY H. BINGHAM,
F. H. GILLETT,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the report, and reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] moves that the House do agree to the conference report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. BINGHAM. Before the gentleman proceeds, I reserve the balance of my time. The report and statement have been inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on two occasions. The only change is that which results in these words:

On page 40, lines 18 and 19, strike out the words "twelve thousand dollars" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$8,000, and the annual compensation of the Secretary of State, including all emoluments or allowances fixed by law, except such as were fixed by law prior to the 26th day of February, 1907, after the 3d day of March, 1909, is hereby fixed at $8,000, and all laws or parts of laws providing different compensation, emoluments, or allowances are hereby repealed, to take effect on the 3d day of March, 1909, except that so much of the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $12,000 for the salary of the Secretary of State for the fiscal year 1909 as may be necessary is hereby made available to pay the said salary as herein fixed at the rate of $8,000 per annum from March 4 until June 30, 1909, inclusive."

After careful examination, that is believed to be the complete expression that will cover the purpose of the House in recent legislation.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to ask the gentleman this question. I want to know how much these amendments of the Senate that the conference committee have agreed to have increased the bill over what it was when it went from the House? How much of increase have you agreed to over what it was when it went from the House?

Mr. BINGHAM. The amount in the bill as passed by the House was $31,662,000; added by the Senate, $664,000; net amount of reduction in conference, $16,000; Senate additions agreed to, $322,000; amount of amendments not agreed to, $325,000; making a sum total of $664,000.

The amounts involved in the amendments not agreed to are as follows: Speaker's salary, $3,000; salary of the President, $50,000; Vice-President, $3,000; Supreme Court, $18,000; circuit courts, $58,000; district courts, $168,000; court of appeals, $5,500; supreme court of the District of Columbia, $12,000; Court of Claims, $7,500. I would state to the gentleman, so that he may get a complete——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not sure whether I understood the gentleman's statement or not, and I will ask again, so that I may be sure about it. I understand from the gentleman's statement that the Senate increased these items about $600,000, and the conference committee has reduced that increase $16,000. Is that correct?

Mr. BINGHAM. It is.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman to yield me ten minutes when the opportunity comes, before he closes the debate, as I would like to speak against the conference report.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield to the gentleman at once.

Mr. MANN. Before the gentleman yields to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], will he yield for a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. The bill as it passed the Senate provided that the six inspectors in the Interior Department should be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Is that Senate amendment agreed to in this conference?

Mr. GILLETT. In the conference report we have changed that to read as follows:

Six Indian inspectors, not required to be engineers, now employed and appropriated for in the Indian Department, at $2,500 each, and said Indian inspectors shall hereafter be termed inspectors, and shall be included in the classified service.

Mr. MANN. I think that is proper.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the adoption of this conference report. I am not opposed to it by reason of any specific item contained in the report, because I say candidly to the House that I have not had the opportunity to investigate the separate items of increase contained in the report, and can not say whether they are justified from their individual standpoint.

But I am opposed to agreeing to this conference report, because it has increased the appropriations contained over the House bill, according to the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, of some $600,000, and the conferees have only been able to make a reduction of that increase of $16,000.

Now, we may evade the question as much as we please, but the Treasury of the United States to-day is in a very precarious condition. So far for the fiscal year we have a deficit, as shown by the books of the Treasury Department, of $80,000,000. Any man who considers the question, or who has studied the revenues of this Government is bound to recognize that, under present conditions, that deficit will not grow less, but in all human probability at the end of the fiscal year it will amount to $150,000,000.

Now, where are we going to get the revenues from? The Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives is considering a bill to supply additional revenue. I do not know what my Republican colleagues on that committee propose to do to increase the revenues, but I know that there is one of two things that they have got to do. They have got to very materially cut the present tariff schedules—because they can only increase revenue by a reduction of the present prohibitive rates—or they have got to levy additional taxes by imposing a tax upon coffee and tea, or a stamp tax or an income tax. The condition of the Treasury is such to-day that we are bound to levy additional taxes on the people of the United States or reduce the present prohibitive tariff rates contained in the Dingley bill.

Now, these extravagant appropriations that have been made in the past have driven the country to this situation; and under these circumstances, under these conditions, I say, it is absolute folly for the great appropriation committees of this House to come here, from day to day and week to week, continually increasing appropriations. I do not care if there is some gentleman in one of the departments who is an able and efficient man who is entitled to an increase of salary.

I say, in the present condition of the Treasury, in the present condition of the country, it is no time for us to stop to consider such cases of increase. It is time for retrenchment. We have reached the time for economy; and if we propose to meet the emergency and relieve the country of the present situation, we must reduce the expenditures instead of going on with these extravagant increases that we find in every appropriation bill reported to this House.

Let me ask you this question: If you do not reduce the prohibitive tariff rates, and you do not levy any additional taxes on the people, where are you going to get the money to pay these expenditures? If you wipe out this deficit, there is only one other way you can do it, and that is to issue government bonds; and the hour and the day that the Secretary of the Treasury announces to this country that he is going to issue more government bonds you will precipitate another panic in this country.

This being the condition, I say the House should vote down this conference report; we should instruct our conferees, because the House holds the purse strings of the Nation; we should instruct our conferees to go back to conference and refuse to increase this appropriation bill and insist that these increases should be stricken out of the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is it not a fact that a greater part of the increases agreed to by the House conferees are increases in the compensation of Senate employees?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I am not discussing the details, because I am not sufficiently familiar with them; but I do say, from a reading of the report, that most of the increases contained in this bill are increases of salary. Well, now, the Government has been running for ten, twelve, or fifteen years with these old salary conditions. Why, in the face of the deficit; why, in the face of the present financial condition of the country, is it necessary to go into these great increases of appropriation?

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to know where the gentleman places the responsibility for these extravagances. Does it rest with the Executive, with the heads of the departments, with the Senate, or with this House? Is it not a fact that the Committee on Appropriations has reported bills here below the estimates, and is not another cause that when the bills go to the Senate they are invariably increased?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I think the gentleman is right about that; but yet this House can not avoid its responsibility. The bills start here, and if we refuse to agree to the increases they can be stopped. Now, under the circumstances, of course, the responsibility rests upon the gentlemen on that side of the House, and the men who control the great appropriation committees of this House, and if they take the responsibility of going to the country with these vast increases of expenditure at this time, when the Treasury is in its present condition, then they, and they alone, are responsible to the country for what they do. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama made the declaration that it was folly on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to come in here from year to year adding increases, and thereby jeopardizing the Treasury of the United States. I want to make this suggestion now to him: He is a prominent member of a committee whose duty it is to provide the necessary funds to run this Government. That committee has sat back for ten years, knowing day by day that the expenses of this Government were increasing, and has made no effort to provide one single dollar to meet these extraordinary expenses increasing from year to year for ten years.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Not now. I am only stating a fact that the gentleman knows.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman does not consider the minority members of that committee responsible for that condition, does he?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I am willing to say that the minority members of that committee are in no way responsible, but I should very much like to see him censuring his own committee and not the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We will at the right time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that the Ways and Means Committee have been hoping all these years that Congress would not appropriate so much money.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And the Ways and Means Committee ought to have known all these years that this country was growing, and that we have taken on the Philippines and Hawaii and engaged in building a canal, with an unparalleled increase in the expenses of the war and navy bills by Congress. The Ways and Means Committee knew all that, and yet have made no provision to meet those increasing expenses.

I admit the fact, Mr. Speaker, that we are extravagant. I have stated it repeatedly, and I have stated it on the floor for the last four years, that unless the Ways and Means Committee came to the rescue of the country we would have a bond issue of millions upon millions of dollars, even to take care of the current expenses of the Government. Yet that committee has paid no attention to it. I have protested against it twice in my annual statements as a member of the committee.

Mr. Speaker, as to the Senate, the gentleman from Alabama knows full well that as to its own affairs the Senate sits and acts as a sovereign, and when we object to these increased salaries and enormous expenses at that end of the Capitol, the Senate conferees reply "that is our right, and we accord the same to the House."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But not all of these increases in salaries have come from the Senate. A great many have come from the executive departments.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, when the bill passed the House and went to the Senate, no appropriation bill for eighteen years had been so economical. There were fewer increases than in any bill for eighteen years, in salaries or otherwise, and the gentleman from Alabama has no ground, nor has any other Member on this floor any ground, to charge this Committee on Appropriations with extravagance in this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman heard very distinctly what I said. I said that they increased this bill $600,000 in the Senate, and the conference committee has only decreased that amount $16,000.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I am coming to that. The Senate had a right to increase the bill. They claim that right and stand on it, and I appeal to the conferees on any bill that goes from this House to the Senate for a verification of the fact that they do stand on that right. Every appropriation bill that goes through this House goes to the Senate, and they increase it.

I say that the conferees on the part of the House were a little bit surprised that the Senate only put $660,000 on it. We expected a million and a half. I want to say this for the conferees on the part of the House: They scrutinized every amendment made by the Senate. We contested every inch of ground where a contest was justifiable. Some of those increases ought to have gone on. They would have gone on in the House if we had known the facts, if they had been presented to us as they were presented to the Senate; but when we thought there was the least ground for objection we made the objection and contested and contended for it, and we thought we had done well, and I think now we did will.

Now, the main increases to the bill as made by the Senate are not agreed to. They begin with the President's salary, $100,000, and come down to the district and other judges whose salaries have been increased. They were not agreed to by the House conferees. They were brought back to the House, and as one of the conferees I stand willing to abide by the judgment of this House on those salaries.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. How much of this $625,000 increase placed upon the bill by the Senate is for salaries?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I can not answer that question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question for information. What is the total increase in this bill as it comes from the Senate?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Six hundred and sixty-six thousand dollars.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does that include the $344,000 for increase of salaries for the President, and so forth?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes; over half of it is for salaries not agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In the report you bring in here, what the conferees really agree to is the difference between $660,000 and $343,000, which would be $317,000?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is about the increase that we have agreed to—about $320,000.

Mr. SULZER. Does the increase that the conferees have agreed to increase the salaries of the United States district and circuit court judges?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, sir; that increase would amount to total $666,000, but $343,000 of that belongs to the increase of the salary from the President down.

Mr. SULZER. The $343,000 increases the President's salary——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, sir; the $343,000 is largely made up from increases in the Senate for their own people.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Not the $343,000—it comes on the other side; $323,000.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes, the $343,000 covers the salaries from the President down that we have not agreed to.

Mr. SULZER. The President's salary ought to be increased, and that of the judges of the circuit and district courts.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman will have a chance to vote on that. If I had the papers at my desk I could show you that perhaps two-thirds of the $323,000 belong over at the other end of the Capitol. Gentlemen must remember that they have a new Office Building there just the same as we have here. They have that to provide for, and they have a great many other things there that are new that we have conceded they have the right to provide for, and we could not say no. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I fear that the figures submitted and as applied by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] will mislead the House. The figures that I read were the official differences between the passage of the bill in the House and the passage of the bill with amendments in the Senate. The great body of these amendments in sum total is in conceding to the Senate that which has always been recognized for many years past, and absolutely controlled on the part of the Senate, for the management of the Senate and its subordinate force. Its present subordinate force is not only appropriated for in detail in the appropriation bill, but in the sum total of current law, which gives to the Senate $150,000 for miscellaneous expenses. And from that sum total, with the appropriations in the bill in detail, provides for the Senate, and by which to-day the Senate is paying its subordinate force.

The bill under consideration cuts that down from $150,000 to $75,000 for miscellaneous expenses. For the first time in its history the Senate comes to this House with detailed expenses as to its subordinate force, in effect complying with the same rules that this House does in the number and increase of its present force. The two Houses propose to organize, so far as detailed work is concerned, under a detail of the exact expenditure for the better advancement of the general management and privileges of the Senate and House.

The aggregate salaries, in round numbers, as passed by the House, is $515,000. The Senate added $177,000, making a total of $692,000. The House aggregate salaries amount to $613,000—$21,000 by special enactment at the commencement of the session, making the sum total of $653,000. Twenty-two clerks to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, $39,000: that runs to the general management of the Senate. But the House exceeds the Senate in expenditure for clerk hire to Members of the House in the sum of $594,000.

The Senate has no such amount by legislation as to clerk hire that the House has. The general management of the Senate and the general management of the House, as it has heretofore and does to-day, rests with the determination of each body as to its own necessities. For reporters of debates and for committee stenographers there is $55,000 for the House and the same amount for the Senate. As I have stated, the Senate has submitted to a reduction of $75,000 from the amount formerly carried of $150,000 for the miscellaneous fund, and has given to the House that knowledge, which has never before been in the possession of the House, as to its organization and expenditure. That will cover a large part of the criticism of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

In addition to that, I will say that the House has yet to vote on the amendments aggregating $19,500 for increases in the Department of State. The House has yet to vote upon the salary of the Speaker, the salary of the President and of the Vice-President, the salaries of the Supreme Court judges, of the circuit court and district court judges, and of the court of appeals and supreme court of the District of Columbia and the Court of Claims, all aggregating a sum total of $344,000.

The gentleman has called attention to the many disagreements between the two Houses. They appear in the report of conference, and the difference is largely in the number, while in effect the difference between the two Houses for the subordinate forces is not large, and is in no way beyond that which has been usual heretofore. This bill was reported and passed by the House early in December, when we assembled. It passed the Senate later in January. The various officials of the different departments of the Government, to whom perhaps the House in its bill had been somewhat drastic, made appeal to the Senate, and the Senate had full hearings, perhaps larger than usual. We have recognized in a reading of those hearings that there is some merit in the claim of the officials of the departments of the Government, and have made reasonable concessions to the Senate and recognize that there should be a little less severity on the part of the House than what was contained in the original bill as reported last December.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman says there are some very large items in dispute between the Senate and the House that are not included in this conference report that is agreed upon. I want to know whether the members of the committee, the gentleman himself in charge of the bill, propose to advocate the adoption by the House of these matters in dispute.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman means the amendment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; the Senate amendments in dispute.

Mr. BINGHAM. Those we will come to. I am asking now for the adoption of the report. The amendments will be fully discussed, and I think they will be on the part of the House—certainly on the part of the committee—reasonable concession for liberal debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to ask the gentleman so that we may have that position before us, what is the attitude of the members of the conference committee in respect to it?

Mr. BINGHAM. I think my attitude is no different from that of any other gentleman in the House.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There has been no expression.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I want to get these figures straightened out, to begin with. The truth about this business is that the Senate increased the House appropriations in this bill $666,000, and in this conference report the conferees cut the Senate amendments down by $16,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman state the amount of that aggregate increase which is on account of salaries paid to employees of the Senate that has heretofore been paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; I will not, because I do not know. But let me make this arithmetical statement and it will clear up a good deal of the fog around here on both sides. The entire increase made by the Senate in this bill is $666,000. The House conferees cut that down $16,000. That leaves $650,000. Then the salaries of the President and others that are set out on the last page of this conference report, together with item as to horses and automobiles——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And to the Undersecretary.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Wait a minute. I understand.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is in there, too.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; it is there, too. All those salaries, including the Undersecretary, and including the appropriation for horses and automobiles, amount to $368,000; $368,000 subtracted from $650,000 leaves an increase made by the Senate of $282,000 that the House conferees agreed to. Now, that is the straight of it.

I want to say a few things about the House and the Senate, and I hope I can say them without running counter to the rule about talking about the Senate. Every man that has been in this House any considerable length of time must know this, that perpetually the Senate bullies the House. That is the plain English of it, and the time must come when this House has got to take a firm stand and to assert positively and unequivocally its position as a coordinate branch of the United States Government.

That being the case, I can not conceive of a more opportune time to make that fight than right now. [Applause.] And I will give you the reasons for it. Ordinarily all of us want to get home at the end of the long session to look after our fences. As a matter of fact, since 1896 I have not been compelled to do that myself, but I have been unusually lucky; my constituents have been very kind to me; but everybody is anxious to get away, and we submit to the impositions of the Senate about appropriations in order to get away. Usually toward the end of the short session the cry arises that if we do not agree to these impositions of the Senate we are going to have an extra session. Well, of course that is very disagreeable. I have served in three of them out of sixteen, but here is the situation now: We are going to have an extra session anyhow. We can not get away from here until we get the tariff bill out of the Congress. In the extra session when the Dingley tariff bill was passed, all that was done was that at the beginning of that session the Speaker appointed only the Committee on Ways and Means, the Committee on Rules, and the Committees on Accounts and Mileage.

The reason of that was that the Hon. Thomas B. Reed did not intend for the House to do anything to distract attention from the Senate. He did not have any use for the Senate, and he wanted to focus public attention on the Senate to watch it dawdle through the dog days. That is the reason for that, and we went through the ridiculous performance here from the 31st day of March until the 27th day of July of meeting about fifteen minutes at a clip twice a week, and right in the teeth of the Constitution. That brilliant and distinguished gentleman from Maine, Mr. Reed, made two adjournments cover seven days, when the Constitution says that one House of Congress shall not adjourn for more than three days at one time without consent of the other. He did it by holding, with the old-time lawyers, that Sunday is no day. If we can not fix these appropriation bills to suit the House, let them fail. That is the way to do it, and you will teach the Senate a lesson which it will not forget while the earth spins on its axis and slides down the ecliptic. And then, after the tariff bill is out of the House, which will be about the 1st of April, I apprehend, or somewhere about that time, let us take up these appropriation bills in order and discuss them fully and thoroughly, item by item. We might as well be doing that as sitting here twiddling our thumbs. I am sorry the regular Speaker has vacated the chair; I wanted to say a few words about him. I will say them anyhow. [Laughter.]

When I first came here, or rather in the second Congress I was here, the present Speaker of the House became chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Time and time again I have seen him make valiant fights on the floor of this House against these impositions of the Senate on appropriation bills. I always helped him. Sometimes he won, sometimes he lost, but he always fought. [Applause.] I will give him credit for that. I believe in giving the devil his due. [Laughter and applause.] I do not mean by that there is any similarity between those two eminent personages. [Laughter.] I remember on a great occasion here seeing the present Speaker of the House and the present governor of Colorado, one a Republican and the other a Democrat, make a heroic fight in this House to save a large sum of money, and they saved it, and it took about a day and a half to do it. [Applause.] I am not going to say much about the squabble between my friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and my friend from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] as to who is to blame about the condition of affairs—whether it is the Committee on Ways and Means or the Committee on Appropriations. I am rather inclined to the opinion, however, that it is the Committee on Appropriations; and I will tell you why. The Committee on Ways and Means is charged with the raising of the revenues to run the Government. Until about the end of the fiscal year 1907 there was a surplus all the time. In the fiscal year 1906 the surplus revenues amounted to $86,000,000. The surplus revenues in 1907 amounted to $25,000,000. The turn had come, but at the end of the fiscal year 1906 there was a working balance in the Treasury of two hundred and fifty-odd million dollars, and I will ask the gentleman from Georgia, who has been a Member nearly as long as anybody [laughter], and been on earth a good long time—and I hope he will be on earth and in the House a good long time yet—what was the sense in the Committee on Ways and Means undertaking to raise more revenue when it was already raising more than the Government was expending, even under an extravagant Republican government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. My answer, Mr. Speaker, is this, that a wise man always anticipates the future in finances, and we did not do it. There was a canal coming upon us, and many other expenses of that kind that we did not foresee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We could not anticipate the extravagance of the gentleman's committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The truth is that a man who could have anticipated at the close of the year 1906 that there was going to be a panic and a deficiency in the Treasury, would have been entitled to displace Solomon in the Bible as the wisest man that ever lived and assume that title for himself.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. BINGHAM. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has sixteen minutes remaining.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Time and time again I have stood up here and warned this House, and a good many of you are sorry, deep down in your hearts, that you did not heed the warning. There are only three ways of making buckle and tongue meet, and that is either to cut down the appropriations or to issue bonds—and issuing bonds simply increases our debts by borrowing money, and is therefore really no remedy at all—or to increase taxation. Now, you have got to do one of those three things. And I want to say, repeating what I have said twice now in the last few days. I am not going to be as bad as Cato was and end up every speech that I make with one sentence. He was in the habit of ending every speech, no matter what the subject, with the sentence, "Carthago est dilenda"—Carthage must be destroyed. No difference what he spoke about, that was the end of it. But I intend to repeat so often that nobody will fail to hear it or understand it, so that the country at large will hearken to it, that there is a deficiency in the revenues now of practically $13,000,000 a month; that it is increasing every day; that it will increase every day until the tariff bill is out of the Congress; that if we drag out that debate until the 1st of September no sensible man need be surprised if the monthly deficiency amounts to $25,000,000 a month. I say, with that prospect staring us in the face, this is a very poor time to increase anybody's salary, I do not care a straw who he is or where he comes from. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am not charged with helping run the Republican party. It may be unfortunate for it that I am not [laughter], but this Congress has to raise $150,000,000 more revenue per annum than it is raising now, unless these appropriation bills are cut down.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You will have to get rid of the Army and Navy Departments.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Where are they going to cut it? I will give a hundred-dollar bill to have a photographic reproduction of the present state of mind of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] as to how they are going to get it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. If the gentleman will tell us how to get it, he shall have it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. While I am at it, because I may not want to make another speech about it, I desire to call your attention, very briefly, to the increase of salaries for the President and others which the House conferees did not agree to. They amount to the enormous sum of $282,000. And there is not a man living that can give a reason why a single one of those salaries ought to be increased 15 cents. I say this, laying aside politics, because this is a business proposition, that we have got to call a halt some time on the increase of salaries in this country; and I thoroughly indorse the statement made by Senator BAILEY once, to the effect that he hoped the time would never come in this country when the salary was the only or the chief inducement to a man accepting a high official position under our Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Just one minute in which to reply to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. As to the control of the Senate in its domination of the House, I desire to say to the gentleman that the House in its general administration as to expenses, and the great conveniences that it extends to its individual Members, exceeds the sum total of the appropriations for the same purposes in the Senate upward of $550,000.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I welcome the sudden zeal for economy on behalf of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The SPEAKER. How much time has been yielded to the gentleman?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman the balance of my time.

Mr. GILLETT. I intend to move the previous question, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to eleven minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. I will only take a very few minutes.

I observe, as is usual in Democratic professions of economy, that they do not discuss the merits of any particular item, but they just make a general plea for economy. They talk economy and they vote extravagance.

I will venture to predict that upon the votes on the sundry civil bill, now before the House and that will be discussed, that when the question of amendments increasing the appropriations come up, it will be that side of the House that will give most of the votes for the increases; that when it comes to practical economy they will not stand up by the speeches they made here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That does not describe what happened yesterday when the gentleman's side voted for payments of $225,000 shown to be absolutely unnecessary.

Mr. GILLETT. I am not speaking of what happened yesterday; I am stating the general practice. The gentleman from Missouri says this is a particularly appropriate time to contest the amendments of the Senate. I venture to say that there has not been a bill within ten years that has been so little increased in its appropriations as this. I do not believe there has been a bill within ten years upon which the Senate has put on so few items that can be fairly condemned as upon this bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. On the fortifications bill they have only put on one amendment, and I do not think that will stay.

Mr. GILLETT. That has not been acted on yet.

Mr. SHERLEY. It has within the past twenty-four hours.

Mr. GILLETT. That is a small bill. I admit, of course, that that may be true of some of the small appropriation bills. But here is a bill that appropriates $32,000,000; and what I am speaking of is the large bills, such as the sundry civil bill and the legislative bill; and of such bills I say that there has not been a bill amended so little within the last ten years as this.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if you analyze this a little, you will see where these increases come, and that we can not prevent them.

The gentleman says they are $282,000; of these $175,000 is increase in the expenses of the Senate. It has always been the policy that each House shall have control of its own expenses. But in this case of that $175,000, $134,000 are in the exact interest of good administration, because the Senate have at last done what the House has contended for years they should do. They have taken away from their contingent fund, out of which they paid their clerks, $134,000 and put it right in the face of the bill. That is what we have been contesting for, and that at last has been accomplished in this bill; and yet the gentleman counts that as extravagance. I count that as economy. So that $175,000 of the $282,000 is for the Senate, over which we have no control. Twenty-five thousand dollars more is in one lump sum for freight on silver bullion, which it will also be admitted will have to be expended or there will be a deficiency. So there are $200,000 of the $282,000. That leaves $82,000 additional on a bill of $32,000,000; and I repeat now what I said before, that I think it is the smallest and least extravagant addition the Senate ever made in the preparation of either of these big bills for ten years.

Now, I will agree to a good deal of what is said about the tendency of the Senate. I admit that we go over there in conference and are constantly struggling and trying to cut down the demands of the Senate. But we are two equal bodies. We can not simply refuse to agree to everything. I do not suppose we are invariably right and that they are invariably wrong; but after talking the matter over we generally come to some compromise which we think is the fairest we can get. In this case we have only admitted $82,000 on a $32,000,000 bill, and I think that is doing exceedingly well for the House as against the Senate; and I think it is an exceedingly inappropriate time for the House to say that we shall try to make the Senate reduce its expenditures. Now I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. The gentleman has made the statement that this side of the House votes for extravagance. As I understand, there are provisions in this bill, which will be discussed at length, favoring increases of $250,000 in the way of salaries. I will ask the gentleman if he will be willing to accept the votes taken on that part of the bill as an index of the temper of this side and on that side on the question of extravagance?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not believe I would. There are questions on which that side votes for economy and this side votes for increases of salary. As a rule, I believe that it is not always extravagance to vote increases; it may be economy to vote increases.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it not a fact that the great increases in the annual expenditures have been incurred in the army and navy, and on which side has the vote been in the House in favor of reducing those large expenditures?

Mr. GILLETT. On both sides.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman knows that three-fourths of the votes against the large increases for military purposes have been on this side of this House, and it has been that side that continually increased these amounts.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not admit that.

Mr. SHERLEY. The records will show it.

Mr. GILLETT. I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves the previous question on the motion to agree to the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken on the adoption of the conference report, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 195, nays 123, answered "present" 3, not voting 64, as follows:

Mr. SHERMAN with Mr. WILLIAMS.

The result of the vote was announced, as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 257. Joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of State to invite the Governments of France and Great Britain to participate in the proposed tercentenary celebration of the discovery of Lake Champlain by Samuel de Champlain.
